MY TRUST

PSALM XXIII

The Lord is my Shepherd,
No want shall I know,
When thru the green pastures
With Him I may go.
Beside the still waters
He guideth my feet.

No harm can befall me, the pleasure is sweet.
Tho faint be my spirit, my strength He'll restore
And e'en death's dark valley affrights me no more.
His rod and His staff are my comfort and stay;
While I follow their guidance I never can stray.

The feast of His table
Before me is spread,
No fear of the enemy
Fills me with dread.
The cup of His blessings
With healing o'erflows,
The oil of His love
Is a balm for all woes.
His goodness and mercy
Shall fail never more.
In the house of the Lord
I will rest ever more.

The Third Douma.

The Third Douma, or Russian Parliament, is now in session. The first was radical and futile. The second, more radical and more futile, ended in a burst of denunciation against the existing order of things and an answering out-pour of vengeance and repression from the supporters and beneficiaries of the existing order. The third Douma is much more conservative. The edict which summoned it greatly restricted the suffrage, and thus eliminated the most fractious and troublesome element of the assembly by cutting off the representation of the corresponding element of the population. The history of the present Douma will in large measure determine whether or not that body shall in the future occupy the position of a legislative assembly or sink to the level of a mere advisory body. There is still a strong representation of those who hold to the former view of the Douma's function. The Douma's address to the czar was a very respectful and loyal document, and announced the determination to uphold the present form of government; but the "present form of government" may reasonably be interpreted as including the legislative function of the Douma itself. At any rate it is no time to despair of Russia and her parliament. It took England many centuries to develop the institutions of representative government, and even in the present year of grace, after more than a thousand years of representative government in one form or another, it is still possible for a hereditary House of Lords to thwart the will of the whole people as expressed through their elected representatives. Give Russia time.

The Pope's Encyclical.

The Pope's recent encyclical on "Modernism" is an attack on almost every phase of modern religious thought. For one things, it settles offhand the whole class of problems which the higher criticism has raised. It waves aside scholarship with all its processes, data and results and settles the whole question by sheer authority. Such a procedure can scarcely be gratifying even to those who, on grounds of scholarship, believe in the truth of the conservative theor which the Pope seeks to establish by authority. The encyclical deals in the same spirit with the growing spirit of liberty and democracy which has been making itself felt in recent years even in the Catholic church. It means a restoration of mediaevalism so far as that lies within the power of a Pope. It means a new crusade, or a renewal of the old crusade, against free thinking (in the proper sense) and free reading. It means a renewed vigilance of the ecclesiastical censorship, a revision and enlargement of the index expurgatorius and an increased rigidity in the enforcement of its prohibitions. We thoroughly agree with the Pope in the wisdom of all these steps—from his point of view. A church ruled by a hierarchy depends for its very life upon the implicit obedience of the laity in thought, word and deed. The "modernists" in the Catholic church are working for the spiritual welfare of the people through knowledge of the truth. The Pope is interested in the preservation of the church through the repression of all variations of opinion.

The Church and the Marriage Law.

After more than fifty years of agitation and effort, the British parliament a few months ago made it lawful for a man to marry his deceased wife's sister. The established church was against the new law and the bishops in the House of Lords were especially determined in their opposition. Since the bill became a law, various bishops have taken various attitudes to it, ranging from compliance to virtual excommunication for those who avail themselves of the privilege which the law confers. The Archbishop of Canterbury says that, in adopting a marriage law which is in conflict with the doctrine of the church, Parliament has so far effected a separation between church and state. If so, Parliament has done a real service to both. But marriage is a matter over which the church can not exercise exclusive control. While marriage is a divine institution, the regulation and legal control of marriage and divorce are the business of the state. The divorce question, for example, is a matter of sociology quite as much as of religion and there is justification for saying that, in the working out of it, more assistance is to be expected from the scientific study of sociology than from exegesis and theology. One may believe and practice according to the dictates of conscience, but even bishops should beware of organized efforts to annul the provisions of civil law.

The Paper Trust.

There is one item on the present tariff schedule which even the stoutest Republican newspapers are in favor of revising without delay. That is the duty on news-print paper and paper-pulp. For some years the price of paper has been constantly advancing and the supply of timber available for making paper-pulp has been rapidly decreasing. It has long been perfectly obvious that our supply of the sort of timber used for making paper-pulp is wholly inadequate to meet the demands of our multitudnous and voluminous newspapers and magazines. It is not a question of excluding foreign competitors to give home producers a chance, but of getting foreign aid to eke out our own inadequate supply and give the consumers a chance. The problem of timber exhaustion is causing alarm to the government. That is the one of the national resources which is most seriously threatened and for the preservation of which the President has called the conference of governors and others, as noted on this page last week. The paper-pulp industry eats up timber faster than a forest fire, and this destruction contributes only to the enrichment of a trust which, protected by a tariff, is anxious only to make a maximum of profit before the supply of raw material is completely exhausted. It is reported that the paper manufacturers have agreed to raise the price of news-print paper $12 a ton in the near future and $10 more during the coming year. The removal of the tariff on paper and paper-pulp would deprive the paper-making industry of no legitimate profit, would afford relief to the much more important publishing industry, would give a monopoly the competition which it ought to have and would draw upon Canadian forests to the preservation of our own timber.

Imports and Exports.

It is only within the last few years that the balance of trade between the United States and Europe has been in our favor. That fact constitutes one of the encouraging differences between the present situation and that which existed in 1893. At that time our imports excelled our exports. Consequently there was a constant flow of gold to Europe to meet the balance. During the twelve months ending with October of the present year our exports exceeded our imports by $111,000,000. For the single month of October, for example, imports were $111,000,000, while exports amounted to $180,0000,000. All this means that there must be an inflow of gold to even the account. It is hard to get up a real panic, or even a money stringency of long duration while the export trade is in such flourishing condition.

Editorial

"The Heart of the Gospel."* II.

The author makes it very clear that the atonement is a thing of personal relations. "In the reconciliation of man to God, there are three living factors—the Heavenly Father, his erring child, and the divine Son by whom they are brought together. Around these three personalities moves the circle of redemption." The parable of the prodigal son shows that the Fatherhood of God is the source of all remedial efforts. The original relationship which man sustains to God as his child has never been and can never be dissolved. The prodigal son, even in his rags and riotous living, was "my son". The response which man makes to God is the response of the child to the father. "The saddest thing about man", our author tells us, "is that he has lost the sense of his divine sonship". "To restore to man the consciousnes of his high lineage, to get him to acknowledge it and to live up to it is the end of God's redemptive effort." It is not a matter of a king seeking to establish his government, primarily, but a father seeking to save his lost children.

What man needs is forgiveness of sin, and the barrier to forgiveness, as our author tells us, is "on man's side; not on God's. It consists not in God's unwillingness, but in man's unreadiness; not in God's offended justice, but in man's incorrigibleness" When man [illegible] God can forgive him, and the object of Christ's death was to bring man to repentance. Dr. Marcus Dods is quoted with approval as saying: "The death of Christ has made forgiveness possible, because it enables man to repent with an adequate repentance and because it magnifies righteousness and binds man to God." In harmony with his view, our author states, truly, that "the point toward which Christian effort is to be devoted in seeking the reconciliation between God and man, is to change man toward God, and not to change God toward man". Hence the preaching of the cross is to break down the only barrier between the soul and the Heavenly Father, namely, impenitence.

Some of the other admirable points made by the author may be briefly mentioned. In the matter of man's salvation God takes the initiative. This was a necessity of the divine nature. "Christ did not die to soften the heart of the judge, but to lay bare the heart of the Father, that all men might see what there is going on within it so long as they continue in sin" Love always takes the initiative in seeking reconciliation. "Seldom does the one who breaks the bond of fellowship take the first step toward reunion. His very sense of guilt keeps him separate and apart." Love always bears the burden of suffering. Dr. A. M. Fairbairn is quoted as saying: "Theology has no falser idea than that of the impassibility of God. If He is capable of sorrow, He is capable of suffering, and were He without the capacity of either, he would be without any feeling of the evil of sin or the misery of man."

The subject of justification is treated under the more modern term of "adjustment", and Dr. Torrey's cards, bearing the printed words, "Get right with God", express the real idea of justification. The word "attunement" was used as a synonym for atonement in the Elizabethan period of English literature, and happily expresses the idea, as it is now illustrated by wireless telegraphy. Just as the transmitter and the receiver must be attuned to the same number of vibrations for the one to receive the message from the other, so it is only when God and man are attuned that correspondence is opened up between them. To secure this attunement is the object of Christ's mission and of the atonement.

It was because of Christ's complete identification with humanity that he was able to accomplish man's redemption. His sufferings were not arbitrarily inflicted, but were the result of the relation in which he stood with the sinning race. He suffered for man in a peculiar sense as one who voluntarily came into union with them for the purpose of securing their salvation. The redemptive value of the atonement lies in this voluntary and chosen relation of Christ to the human race as an integral part of it. "The humanity that has Christ in it is potentially a saved humanity. Nothing can ever separate it from the benefits of Christ's redemption."

In a chapter on "Attempted Explanations" he states the various theories of the atonement which have prevailed in the past, such as the penal or satisfaction theory of Anselm, the rebound from that in the "moral influence" theory of Abelard, and the "governmental" theory by Grotius, which is intended to be a sort of middle ground between the other two theories mentioned. The inadequacy of these theories is pointed out, although each has a kernel of truth in it. The works of Dr. Dale and Dr. Denny are both passed briefly under review. The statement of the latter that "Christ took on Him the consequence of our sins; He made our responsibilities as He found them, His own", is rejected as wholly untenable by our author, who says: "Now whatever the death of Christ does for us, it certainly does not remove from us the responsibility of sin. Contrariwise, it heightens and deepens the sense of personal responsibility for sin".

Coming to the "Marrow of Christ's Mediation", Dr. Campbell says that Christ's death "occupies an essential place in the harmony of redemption. It was not a mere incident—a mere human tragedy—but an event of moral significance; yea, the grandest, the profoundest event that ever took place in the moral life of mankind." He disagrees with Dr. Bushnell who said "Christ was not here to die, but He died because He was here." On the contrary our author holds that "Nothing can be clearer than that He came here to die. It was His death that gave to His sacrificial life its saving efficacy." The extreme view which once regarded Christ's death apart from his life, has, in some cases, led to an opposite extreme of making the life everything and the death nothing The truth lies between these two extremes.

*By Rev. James M. Campbell, D. D., Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago and New York.

A Debt of Gratitude.

It is a good thing just following our national Thanksgiving, when we have been giving thanks to God for all his benefits to us, to remember our debt of gratitude to those faithful servants of God who gave the strength of their manhood to the preaching of the gospel of the grace of God, with no thought of earthly recompense. "Blessed is he that considereth the poor" says that best of all books—the Bible. If this be true of the poor in general, it is especially true of those through whose poverty we have been spiritually enriched. We cannot doubt that God's special blessing will rest upon those who consider and tenderly care for our aged and dependent ministers whose lives have been worn out in the service of Christ and from whom we have received a spiritual legacy far more valuable to us than any of our material possessions.

While our own hearts, therefore, have been made grateful for blessings we have received, let us see to it that these aged, infirm servants of God and their dependent families shall have occasion to thank God for his tender mercies and loving kindness toward them, not the least of which is that they have a place in the thoughts and affectionate care of their brethren. Perhaps no other blessing can bring greater joy and peace to the hearts of these worn-out preachers than to feel that they are remembered for the work they have done, and for the sacrifices they have made in the strength of their younger manhood, for the cause we love. Let us, by all means, give them this evidence that they are remembered, and that their work is appreciated, in the substantial gifts that we make to redeem the closing years of their lives from want and anxiety. We bespeak a generous offering on the third Lord's day in December, for the Ministerial Relief Fund, as an expression of our gratitude to the men through whose poverty our whole brotherhood has been enriched.

Notes and Comments.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement, which is now a little more than a year old, and which is doing so much to deepen interest in foreign missions, gave a banquet at the Planters Hotel, in St. Louis, recently, at which great addresses were made by Mr. William T. Ellis, of Philadelphia, the newspaper correspondent who has been writing extensively in relation to foreign missions from personal observation on the field, by Mr. Brockman, for ten years the Y. M. C. A. secretary in China, and by Mr J. Campbell White, who is the general secretary of the movement. On the following evening, there was a massmeeting at the Third Baptist Church, at which addresses were delivered by the same gentlemen, and at the close a resolution was adopted, pledging those present to use their efforts to raise, through our various churches, the sum of $250,000 the coming year for foreign missions, which would more than quadruple the amount heretofore raised. Mr. White, although a "layman", is a powerful speaker in behalf of missions, and has a very forceful way of laying the matter upon the consciences of the business men whom he addresses. The movement will doubtless accomplish great good for the cause of missions.

In all the religious bodies there is a movement for the organization of men. The Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, under one name or another, are mobilizing their men for aggressive action. There is "The Presbyterian Brotherhood", "The Brotherhood of Methodist Men" and other similar organizations such as "The Wesley Brotherhood", The Brotherhood of St. Paul", etc. Is it not time that we were having a revival of interest in our men's organization, both local and national? Surely these are times when our strong men need to get together to meet the great demands that are upon the church today. We were first in agitating this matter of men's organization; shall we be last in perfecting it?

Commenting upon "The Brotherhood of Methodist Men", "The Central Christian Advocate" quotes from a layman, Mr. William B. Patterson, executive of "The Wesley Brotherhood", as follows:

"Never before in the history of Christianity has the church been called upon to handle larger propositions or to solve greater problems than those presented to-day. And the only reasonable question that could possibly arise is whether the brotherhood idea is adapted to the development of the latent force which it proposes to unloose and utilize for the everlasting betterment of men, the upbuilding of the church with material essentially vigorous, virile and masculine, and the eternal glory of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. In apostolic days the growth of the church depended largely upon the efforts of laymen. To-day not only the growth of the church, but the influence that she shall wield in the affairs of the kingdom, depends largely upon the active loyalty of men."

Speaker Cannon, in a speech delivered at a banquet held in the Auditorium Annex, Chicago, on November 14, if he be correctly reported, made some amazing utterances coming from a man of his high official position. He not only favored the restoration of the army canteen, but he denounced as "demagogues" all those who demand the abolition of the army and navy canteen. Mr. Cannon has a right to differ from the sentiment expressed by the great religious bodies of this country in condemning the army and navy canteen, but he has no right to deliberately insult the moral sentiment of the nation by his offensive remarks, as reported in "The Record-Herald" of that city. We should be glad to learn that Mr. Cannon has been misrepresented. Otherwise, he has used the influence of his high position to insult the churches and to antagonize the present wave of anti-whiskey sentiment that is sweeping over the country.

Make more of your prayer-meetings. Use the splendid line of topics we are printing each week in THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, with comment. Try the plan of having each member of the official board lead the meeting in turn for awhile. Dr. Philputt, of the Union Avenue Christian Church, of St. Louis, has adopted that method and the various leaders are vying with each other in securing large attendance and excellent metings. Never has the attendance been so large nor the interest in the prayer-meeting so deep. Make a special effort to enlist those to take an active part who are not accustomed to do so. People like to hear new voices in prayer-meeting. Announce the prayer-meeting topic and leader a week ahead, and give the leader time not only to prepare himself but to enlist helpers who can prepare themselves to take part.

The St. Louis branch of the Bible League of North America held its first conference in this city recently, lasting three days. This league represents the most conservative school in Biblical criticism. Among the speakers was Dr. McPheeters, who gave an address on "The Changes of View on Religion and the Bible, Necessitated by Radical Criticism." He explained, in the beginning, that he did not mean by "radical criticism" the "higher criticism", in the legitimacy of which many of the most devout and reverent scholars believe. He called that radical criticism which strikes at the very roots of the Bible and religion. In that view all of us would certainly agree. We were glad to hear Dr. McPheeters make this obvious distinction, which many less thoughtful writers fail to do. No doubt Dr. McPheeters would class under "radical criticism" some things which other scholars would regard as legitimate criticism; but it is something gained to have the perfect legitimacy of the historical criticism of the Bible recognized by this school of conservative critics. This has been the head and front of our offending.

It does not pay to despise the little things of life. Dr. Edward A. Ayers estimates that the mosquito causes more than a quarter of a million deaths each year. If bears were thus destroying the lives of our people, how we would rise up in arms against them! Wonder how many souls are being destroyed each year by little sins, which poison the soul, deaden its moral sensibilities and lead on to spiritual suicide. Beware of the little foxes that destroy the grapes.

The St. Louis Breweries have announced their purpose to put out of business all disorderly saloons which are under their control, and which offend the moral sense of the people. When the devil became seriously indisposed, it will be remembered, he thought he would like to be a monk; but as soon as convalescence set in, his satanic majesty decided to remain a devil. This spasm of virtue on the part of the breweries—whence comes it? It is the result of the tidal wave of anti-saloon sentiment sweeping over the country. This dike of respectable and orderly saloons will not suffice to stay this tidal wave. It is a case of death-bed repentance, with the mental reservation that it doesn't count if death does not ensue!

Claris Yeuell, referring to our recent editorial on "Things Which Make for Unity", in which we urged the importance of a better understanding between the opponents of missionary societies and instrumental music in the worship, and our suggestion of a conference with some of the representatives of these brethren, sends us a copy of "The Christian Courier" of July 26, 1900, containing a report by O. P. Spiegel of such a conference held in Montgomery, Ala., in May of that year. The report gives the points which were unanimously endorsed, covering all the essential features of our missionary co-operation. Brother Spiegel says of that conference: "I have never attended a more harmonious or sweeter spirited convention than this was. Not an unkind word, or 'red' face during the entire proceedings. We now know each other better and love each other more. For three days we tried to look through each others' glasses, and we succeeded to a great extent." The conference planned to have other meetings, but we have no knowledge as to what has been the ultimate result. We can see nothing but good, however, to result from such a conference conducted in the spirit which seems to have prevailed in this one at Montgomery, Ala.

We regret exceedingly that through some miscount or underestimate of new subscribers and extra copies, there was a shortage in our last week's issue, and that the edition was exhausted before the Georgia list had been mailed. We can only offer this explanation and apology and promise our readers that this shall not occur again. Our readers ought to know, too, that we are passing through the tribulations incident to a "strike" among printers and pressmen. Bear with us patiently a little while, when we hope everything will move on as usual.

The following document has been sent to us by Alexander McMillan, of Winnipeg, Manitoba, with the request that we comment on same:

BASIS OF UNION

Between Baptists and Disciples of Portage La Prairie, Agreed to by Revs. P. H. Green and M. A. MacLean, and Ratified by Both Congregations.

The members of the two congregations constituting the Baptist Church and the Church of Christ, Portage La Prairie, Manitoba, Canada, hereby agree to unite and hereafter be one congregation, and forever and ever to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

We agree in all particulars to seek the unity presented by the church in the New Testament.

In particulars we agree to the following:

1. The Name.—"United Church of Christ (Baptists and Disciples)," pending final action as to name when union has been effected throughout Canada.

2. Doctrinal Basis.—(1) The local church is a company of baptized believers who, in any given community, voluntarily band themselves together in accordance with New Testament teachings for the establishment of Christ's kingdom in their lives and in the world. (2) As above defined, the local church is independent of all human organization beyond its bounds, and is answerable to Jesus Christ alone in all matters pertaining to faith and moral practice. (3) Jesus Christ our Lord is the one foundation of the Christian's hope, in his life, in his death and in his eternal mediation. (4) Man has spiritual life only as he is joined to Jesus Christ, his living head. (5) We accept the Scripture teaching as to the place of faith, repentance, and baptism, in the divine plan of redemption and as set forth in such scriptures as the following: Mark 16:15, 16; John 3:5, 7, 14, 16, 36; Acts 2:38; 3:19; 10:43, 47; 16:33; Romans 6:3, 5, 23; Col. 2:12, 13; 1 Pet. 3:20, 21; Tit. 3:4, 7; 1 John 5:10-12, etc. (6) That we understand from these and other scriptures that spiritual life begins in the soul, not in baptism, but before baptism in saving faith or truth in the Lord Jesus Christ—that saving faith becomes an active principle of obedience, which obedience rightly begins in baptism, and continues throughout the whole Christian life. (7) That the ordinance of the supper commemorating our Lord's death be observed, as in the New Testament church, on the first day of the week. (8) That we recognize, and from time to time send delegates and reports to the representative gatherings of Baptists and Disciples in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. (9) That the missionary and other benevolent work of both bodies be regularly presented and stated offerings therefor taken. (10) That the question of church property be placed in the hands of a joint board of trustees, to be appointed by both churches, and equally representative of each church, the decision of said board of trustees to be subject to ratification by both congregations. (11) That candidates for church fellowship be received on the mutual responsibility of the candidate, the pastor and the church.

It is a matter for profound gratitude that the brethren in Western Canada, representing the Baptists and Disciples of Christ, are working together so harmoniously and in a number of cases, as that at Portage La Prairie, have united their local congregations. Referring to the above 'Basis of Union" we have a single suggestion to make with a view of avoiding any misunderstanding of what is intended by the "Doctrinal Basis" as given above. We would add to the words, "In particulars we agree to the following:" a statement to this effect: "But this basis of doctrine is not to be understood as a creed that is binding on the conscience of any one, but is a brief summary of the things upon which we agree given for information." This would guard against the mistake which some might make, of interpreting this doctrinal basis as a new creed, whose precise statements must be agreed to in order to fellowship in this United Church of Christ. As we understand, the statement is educational, and as such it may be highly useful in promoting a better understanding as to the things in which the brethren are already agreed. We have no doubt this is the real intent and meaning of this doctrinal basis, but to guard against any misconception or misuse of it by others, it might be well to insert some such statement as that suggested above.

—Of F. D. Power's address published in our last week's issue, a Baptist minister writes: "It is fine and should be put in tract form for campaign purposes. That alone to me was worth a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Strange, is it not, that upon these matters our Baptist papers are almost silent. If we want to know what is being done along the lines of union we have to come to you. Keep it up, and soon prejudice and ignorance will give place to knowledge and fraternity." Our brother's criticism on Baptist papers is, on the whole, just. Few of them have given the attention to this question that it deserves. But this particular congress several of them have reported, though as yet we have noticed no editorial comment. We hope to let our readers see how some of the Baptists present regarded this subject. Brother Power gives a report in "As Seen from the Dome" this week.

—We have received a pamphlet entitled "Our Earnest Contention", being a sermon by our well-known brother, J. Mad Williams, of Des Moines, Iowa, prepared, as he tells us, for use at the Minneapolis convention, before an audience of people who knew nothing or little of our position. It is based on the familiar text in which we are exhorted to "contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered unto the saints". It is a clear, scholarly, discriminating, and convincing presentation of the chief things for which we contend. Its wide circulation would be a blessing to the cause of Christ. A copy of this pamphlet of 61 pages may be had by addressing "The Christian Union", Des Moines, Ia. The price of a single copy is 25 cents.

—A business man who has been traveling for eight years "between the two oceans", accompanied by his wife, writes that in one of the cities where our Brother James Small was holding a meeting, he and his wife became interested and regular attendants, becoming strongly attached to the evangelist. He says: "We were members of the Congregational church, nevertheless, Brother Small led us down into full baptism; and O the joy it has been to us!" Some one gave his wife a copy of "Alone With God", of which she became very fond and often wished to use it in their evening devotion, but the husband objected. A year and a half ago his good wife went home to God. In going through her trunk the husband found a copy of the book, the pages of which were marked with her words of appreciation. The brother adds, "I have read it every evening. If I should attempt to write of the comfort and help it has been to me, it would take a long letter. It has taught me the lesson not to allow narrow prejudice to separate me from the teaching of other churches. Oh how I wish "Alone With God" could be placed into the hands of all Christians, both old and young!" This brother writes that he is a constant traveler, remaining a month and sometimes longer in the large cities, and that he takes great pleasure in giving short addresses to business men, on Christianity. We invite special attention to this statement: "I wish I could say to all Christians who talk but little of any religion between Monday and Saturday, that it is popular among all classes of people." If all Christian business men were to follow this example, what a mighty impetus it would give to Christianity!

Editor's Easy Chair.

Now enters on the stage gruff, burly December, coming down from the North with a flurry of snow on his head, to serve notice upon us that the end of the year approaches. These are days of grace that remain, in which we are to gather up the raveled edges of our year's work, and add a few good deeds more, if possible, to the record of 1907. As the sun seems to move faster as it nears the horizon at the close of day, so the year glides swiftly to its close when December has arrived. As one often puts fresh energy into his work that he may finish a given task before the setting of the sun, so the feeling comes to us that there are certain unfinished tasks that we would like to complete before the year has finished its course. As the lengthening shadows of age come on, we realize that what we do must be done quickly and we feel that we must conserve our energies and concentrate them upon things worth while. Alas, how many there are which engage the time and attention and consume the life and energies of men, which are not worth while! In this category may be placed the mad chase for wealth, the purely selfish aims of personal ambition, the vain pursuit of pleasure for pleasure's sake, bitter personal controversies, and all attempted short cuts to knowledge, virtue or heaven. If these things were eliminated from our human lives, how much more time we should have for honest, faithful work in the place which God's providence has assigned us, for the development of our higher nature and for reaching out the helping hand to those who are in need of a friendly lift. After all, it is not so much more time that we need as a wiser use of the time God has given us.

There is one lesson growing out of the current monetary stringency that ought not to be lost. The churches may well learn a lesson from the banks. When the crisis came in New York and it was realized that some of the weaker and more heavily involved banks would have to go to the wall, the leading financiers got together, it is reported, and put J. Pierpont Morgan in charge of the situation, and it is said that he told the leading bankers and capitalists of New York to bring their securities to his office, and place them at his disposal, so that he could use them where they would be most needed, just as a general holds his reserves ready to reinforce that part of his line of battle that is most hardly pressed. In this way he saved the day for the New York banks. In all the other cities it is known how the banks have stood together, all of them realizing that the failure of one would be the injury of all, and so they have helped each other through the financial crisis. Is there not a suggestion here for the churches of a given city or community or state? When one church fails for the lack of proper care, or a little timely financial support, do not all the churches suffer loss, inasmuch as the cause which they all represent is so much the weaker for that failure? Why should not the churches help one another in times of need, the strong bearing the infirmities of the weak? Would not this be an exemplification of the real Christian spirit that would attract the attention and win the admiration of the world? Our city, district, state, and national organization of churches into groups for missionary purposes, ought to have this as one of their chief aims: that no church should be permitted to languish and die for lack of proper support. If banks help one another through financial crises, why should not the churches of Jesus Christ do the same, and from even higher motives than those which prompt these financial institutions?

Is not the time coming, in the golden age that is yet to be, when society will be organized and conducted on this principle of mutual helpfulness? Is not this the goal toward which the world is moving? This little panic which we have been having has helped us to understand how closely society is knit together and by how many bonds we are united. A bank failure in New York City is felt the next day, if not the same day, in all the country banks of the nation. We are no longer so many isolated units each independent of his fellow, but we are bound together in a community of interests so that when one member suffers all suffer. This is the very lesson we need to learn, and if the panic shall serve to impress this truth properly upon our hearts and minds, it will more than compensate us for the vast shrinkage in the value of securities which has occurred. As soon as we come to understand that society is a unit, and that we must stand or fall together, how foolish will appear all ruinous competition, all warfare between different kinds of business, all oppression of labor by capital or capital by labor! How mean and un-American, to say nothing of its being un-Christian, will the crushing of the weaker by the stronger appear! What we mean to say is that a true and enlightened understanding of our mutual relationships in society, and of our interdependence upon each other for the realization of our high aims and ideals, would render impossible the present fratricidal methods of business and all that over-reaching of greed and avarice which ignores the rights of others. The fact that Christianity has this form of human society for its goal in the kingdom of God, which it is seeking to establish in the earth, shows what complete harmony exists between the ideals of Christianity and of the most enlightened aims of social science.

This brings to the front the old problem of "Individualism or Socialism—Which?" So the old question is often put, but the very putting of it in that way implies what is not true—that there is antagonism between the two. We must believe in the individual, and in giving him opportunity for the highest possible development of his character and of all his powers. We must also believe that any number of individuals thus developed must seek to extend to others the benefits which they themselves have enjoyed, and to have incorporated in laws, customs, institutions, and constitutions, those principles which their wisdom and experience have taught them to be best for human beings in general. The regeneration of society begins with the individual. Society is regenerated only as its individual members come into newness of life, and embody that life in social forms. When a man gets right with God, he is likely to make an effort to get right with his fellowmen; and in this way society is reformed and government is made purer and better. The individual cannot reach his highest development except in a society where others share with him the benefits of mental and moral culture. So the welfare of the individual and that of society are bound up together. "No man liveth unto himself, and no man dieth unto himself." Because Christianity recognizes this fact, and seeks to realize through regenerated and developed individuals a new social organism in which the principles of Christ shall prevail, it is the most regnant and only adequate force for building here on earth the City of God, and of bringing mankind to its highest and best development.

Let us gather another lesson from our financial flurry. Everybody recognizes the fact that it is lack of confidence more even than lack of currency that has brought about the tightness in the money market. Men have lost confidence, to some extent, in the stability and integrity of great industrial corporations and financial institutions. In many cases, perhaps in most cases, this is undeserved. But a few instances of corrupt practices and dishonest methods have served to undermine the confidence in the many that are honest and stable. So we have another striking illustration that faith or trust is not only a condition of eternal salvation, but of business prosperity. We must believe in each other and trust each other, or our commercial life is, at an end. This principle lies at the foundation of our industrial, social and political life. In the matter of our relations with each other as human beings, we must trust each other; in the matter of our relations with God, we must trust God. In human affairs, men and institutions must show themselves to be worthy of trust. The man whose record does not inspire confidence, must not expect to be trusted. The same is equally true of any institution. In order that God might show himself worthy of our trust and confidence, he sent his Son into the world to reveal his true character and relationship to men. When all our business life is conducted on such principles as will inspire confidence, we shall have no more panics. Being saved by faith in God, and in one another, we shall have peace not only with God, but with all mankind.

The New Day in Ministerial Relief

The Norfolk Convention marks the beginning of a new era in the history of Ministerial Relief. The report of the Board showed a loss in special gifts, but a gain in the general receipts. The address of A. B. Philputt on "The Dignity and the Scope of Ministerial Relief" sounded the note for enlargement, which was most heartily approved by the convention, and the address ordered published in the minutes. We are coming to realize that somewhere and somehow more emphasis must be laid upon the importance, the dignity, and the sacredness of the Christian ministry. The inadequate salaries paid many of our ministers, the undignified way in which some of this support is secured, and our indifference toward our retired ministers, have all had a tendency to discourage young men from entering the ministry. Say what you will of their need of conviction or of their indifference to higher things, you hold out to them a calling insured an inadequate support, to be followed by an old age of pinched poverty, and only those born with the martyr's spirit will be likely to accept.

The King's Embassadors, Not the Church's Paupers.

By W. F. Richardson.

The most shamefully neglected work among the people who call themselves "Disciples of Christ" is that of Ministerial Relief. Yet it is of all the most deserving. For our obligation to the aged and needy preacher of the gospel is not alone that of plenty to want, nor of brother to brother, but of recipient to benefactor. These men of God have brought to us the message of the King, the divine proclamation of pardon. Through their earnest ministry were we brought into the fellowship of the redeemed of earth and heaven, and made to become heirs of eternal life.

Our obligation to them, therefore, is that of debt, and we may not without sin allow them to suffer in the time of their need. They have toiled for a pittance in many instances, and have seldom, if ever, been remunerated by the church in proportion to their labors. It has been impossible for them to save up a competence for their old age, even if they could have spared the time and thought necessary for the exercise of such a precaution. They were on business for the King, and could not tarry to calculate profit to themselves. "This one thing I do" was their motto, and faithfully did they adhere to it.

How shall we treat these embassadors of our Lord? Thus far we have aided a few of them, giving to no one more than the pitiful amount of one hundred dollars a year. Most of them we have been unable to aid at all. To the cry of numbers of these saints, and even the appeal of their widows, we have been compelled to reply, "No funds." And yet our hands are full of the money that belongs to our King. What will he say as to our stewardship, if we longer neglect his faithful messengers who have spent their strength in carrying his message to dying men?

We ought to place in the treasury of our Ministerial Relief Fund sufficient means to allow of a pension of not less than three hundred dollars a year to every disabled minister of the gospel. This would be but a meager supply for their wants, but would in many cases seem a generous provision to these humble servants of Christ, and would perhaps be nearly as large an income as many of them were accustomed to receive during the years of their active ministry. Let us ask the pardon of our dear Lord for our long neglect of his faithful servants, and bring such offerings this year for their relief as will gladden their hearts and please him to whom we owe our redemption.

Our Christianity on Trial in Ministerial Relief.

By E. L. Powell.

It seems hardly necessary to press upon the attention of our brotherhood the great need for enthusiastic and whole-hearted interest in the work of the Board of Ministerial Relief. Certainly it would be difficult to think of any appeal having a stronger claim upon the heart and purse of the churches. All of us recognize that faithful service should be remembered and honored; and when we consider the splendid self-sacrifices and work done by those who are under the care of the Ministerial Relief and others who are seeking this ministry, it seems as if there should be but one answer from all of the churches of our brotherhood. I sincerely trust that greater things may be done for this work. The work is so practical that it comes necessarily within the realm of practical Christianity. If our Christianity does not stand this test, it will hardly be able to stand other tests of life and conduct.

I can only add my voice to that of others in urging that the Board of Ministerial Relief be lifted to its proper eminence and given the support which it so imperatively demands.

What Are We Going to Do?

As the Disciples of Christ we are going to place more emphasis upon the dignity and sacredness of the Christian ministry than we have been doing. We are going to give to the world a better expression of our love for our Lord in the way we shall provide for his worthy needy saints. We are going to make glad the hearts and fill with joy the closing years of those noble men and women whose strength and vigor have been consumed in a service of unselfish devotion to truth and duty. We are going to redeem ourselves from the shame of indifference that has caused many a faithful old minister of the word to suffer the pains of a pinching poverty. We are going to sound the note of a great joy in the conscious awakening of the brotherhood to the importance and the privilege of this work of Ministerial Relief. We are going to demonstrate by the support we give this work the unity of the plea for which the Disciples have stood the able exponents for almost a century. We are going to put Ministerial Relief, one of the essential features of this great plea in its proper place for consideration on the catalog of our regular annual offerings. We are going to follow our Saviour's direction in this as in other important matters.

These statements are made in the utmost confidence that our brethren will do that which God gives them to see is right; that this matter is now coming so clearly before us that only the ungrateful, if any such there be, will longer neglect its divine claims. Then, too, there is a joy in this ministry known only to those who have been its regular supporters, the joy of making others happy. And this is not a mere sentimentalism, it is the King's business; something to do; something definite for each one to do. The third Lord's day in December is the occasion. All are to have part. An offering for the work of this ministry means a contribution to the care and support of "The Old Guard," to the blessedness that comes through giving, to the dignity of the ministry, to the honor of the church, and to a proper setting of our Christianity before the world. Certainly you see its importance. Now for your offering.

As Seen From the Dome By F. D. Power

The Baptist Congress, held in the Eutaw Place Church, Baltimore, November 12-14, was in some respects notable. The brethren wrestled with four questions: The Virgin Birth, Ethics of Present Day Fiction, Fear in Religion and Organic Union of Baptists, Free Baptists and Disciples of Christ. Two sessions were given to the last theme. Desirability, present status and next steps to be taken were the three heads under discussion. The spirit of the meeting was most irenic. Dr. W. G. Partridge, of Pittsburg, spoke strongly in favor of union. He declared Alexander Campbell was for many years the great champion of the Baptist brotherhood, and saw no ground for present division. Dr. A. S. Hobart dealt with the desire of Free Baptists for union as a denomination, while the Baptist National Societies can do no more than co-operate in missions, leaving the question of local consolidation to the churches. Prof. A. W. Anthony proclaimed the wish of Free Baptists to overcome all obstacles to union and evidently felt the situation more favorable for union between Free Baptists and Baptists than between Free Baptists and Disciples. Dr. Wayland Hoyt thought a trend was a great thing, and we should do all in our power to advance the trend. Dr. A. G. Lawson spoke of the happy fellowship he had always enjoyed with Free Baptists and Disciples. Peter Ainslie greatly impressed the Congress. He thought it positively immoral to resist the influences in favor of union and was ready to give up anything necessary to that end, save that essential in the written word. Denominational names and traditions were nothing in the presence of a lost world. J. W. Mauck, President of Hillsdale College, Michigan, speaking of the next steps toward union, thought a vigorous campaign against pride in denominational names first needful. Matters of communion and mixed membership should be left to the local church. Doctrinal statement might be made to satisfy some, but greater diversity exists within each denomination than between any two of them, and each places individual liberty above community of statement. Consolidation of weak churches and cooperation in foreign missions were other steps. Dr. F. M. Goodchild vigorously arraigned denominationalism and quoted John 17, as did all the speakers. Our ancestors sacrificed liberty to preserve unity; our fathers sacrificed unity to win liberty; ours it is to show liberty and unity inseparable. Pastors should preach unity and pray that all hindrances may be removed.

Errett Gates stood for a larger union that might embrace all believers, and suggested steps toward closer fellowship between the three bodies: willingness of the churches to accept members from each other on equal footing, refusal to establish new churches in communities where sister churches exist that are sufficient to meet the demands; closer fellowship in social unions, ministerial associations, educational institutions; exchange of pulpits, etc. Dr. G. E. Horr favored a platform or statement of principles, a campaign of education, a union of equals, and felt the place to begin was the local churches. Change in denominational names might be necessary and the name Baptist was not descriptive of the principles for which the church stands. Regenerated membership rather than a distinct form of baptism was the position. Dr. H. E. Fosdick, Montclair, N. J., felt that unity was an accomplished fact in his church, which had in it Free Baptists and Disiples, among the latter being a granddaughter and a great-granddaughter of Alexander Compbell. Altogether there was a very frank and fraternal interchange of views by the brethren, all around, and, as the proceedings in published form have wide circulation, we may hope for results.

The death of D. R. Lucas touches many of us. At the Norfolk Convention he was a sick man and had to hasten away. My first acquaintance with him dates way back to a visit at the capital. He agreed to preach for me. I asked his theme. "The Great Conflict of Romanism, Protestantism and Infidelity," was the answer. "Gracious, man," I exclaimed, that will take a week!" The sermon lasted half an hour, and was a most satisfactory one. You will find it in the "Iowa Pulpit." Two of his stories were specially good. When Chaplain of the 99th Indiana, 1861-64, there was much rivalry between his regiment and the 70th Ohio. Lucas was baptizing forty men one day in the Black river, in Mississippi. Col. Cockerill, and Ohio regiment, hearing of the good work, turned to his adjutant and said: "Detail fifty men of the 70th Ohio and have them baptized at once. It will never do to let that Indiana regiment get ahead of us." Another time preaching at Camp Sherman on the text: "If God be for us who can be against us?" he repeated it several times with great emphasis, when an Irish soldier spoke up and asekd; "Chaplain, would yez like to know?" "Certainly" said Lucas. "Jeff Davis and the divil thin, I yez wan to know," replied Pat. A grim smile passed around. "You are right," said the Chaplain, "and we will fight Davis and his post till we conquer and the devil the rest of our lives; all in favor of that say 'Amen!'" And the response was fervent and emphatic.

Our brother was a most lovable man, and did splendid service, for the Master. He was strong and yet gentle; patriotic, devout, industricus, fearless, true to Christ and untering in his labors for the upbuilding of the kingdom. God be blessed for him.

George A. Miller has just closed a fine meeting with our Ninth Street Church. Forty-six were added, Mrs. J. E. Powell was the singer, and her beautiful voice was a great help in the work of saving people. It was a delightful season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Our churches here are generally prosperous. The recent Y. M. C. A. Convention brought a number of our people to the city and was a wonderful meeting in many ways. Over 300 conversions are reported, and thousands heard with profound interest the messages of earnest men.

This week our C. E. Convention is on, and Dr. Clark and Mr. Shaw and others are with us. Robert P. Anderson, the Superintendent of C. E. builders union, is a Disciple and formerly missionary in Denmark and Norway. He is making good in his new office. He is our first secretary in the offices of the United Society.

The devoted wife of our beloved B. A Abbott, of Baltimore, entered into her rest Nov. 21. Four years she has been a sufferer, and bore with great patience and heroism and Christian cheerfulness her trial. Her husband is a great preacher, but she was greater. Blessed indeed are the dead that die in the Lord. Immediately they do rest from their labors and their works do follow them.

PUT AWAY PICKLES

Mathematician Figures Out the Food Question.

If anyone requires a clear head it is the teacher of mathematics. He must reason in the abstract as it were, and full concentration of mind is necessary if correct results are to be forthcoming

An Ohio man writes:

"I am a teacher of mathematics and for 15 years prior to four years ago, I either took a lunch composed of cold sandwiches, pickles, etc., to school or hurried home and quickly ate a hot dinner.

"The result was I went to my afternoon work feeling heavy, dull of brain and generally out of sorts. Finally I learned about Grape-Nuts and began to use it for my noon-day lunch.

"From the first I experienced a great change for the better. The heavy, unpleasant feeling and sour stomach caused by the former diet disappeared. The drowsy languor and disinclination to work soon gave way to a brightness and vim in my afternoon work, a feeling entirely new to me.

"My brain responded promptly to the requirements put upon it, and what is of more importance, the results have been lasting and more satisfactory, the longer I have used Grape-Nuts as a food.

"My wife had been suffering from weak stomach accompanied by sick headaches nearly all her life. She is invariably relieved of these when she sticks to Grape-Nuts, either eaten roy or with milk Her stomach has gradually grown stronger and her headaches less frequent since she began to eat Grape-Nuts." "There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the booklet, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Some Bible Lookings

By Judge Durham

The American people are the greatest "lookers" on the earth. During every vacation, whether it be a recreation of months or years, every habitable spot on our planet is peopled with American "lookers," and if they could devise some plan they would be climbing the mountains on the moon or wandering along the canals of old Mars. It was probably in Greece that I had a conversation with an intelligent citizen on the large per cent of American visitors in those foreign lands. He claimed it was because they had so much more money than any other people, for he could see nothing but the money question. I replied, "No, sir, not so much that, as that we are a 'want-to-know' and 'want-to-see' people; for an American will give his last dollar to see something new."

But when we turn to the "lookings" of Scripture we have the most interesting and instructive lessons, and beginning with that great historic incident when Lot and his family were fleeing from old Sodom, and they were told so explicitly not to look behind them, yet, Lot's wife thought to run the risk of a violation of God's command. She is the only woman our Savior told us to "remember" and that was because she "looked" in the wrong direction. There are too many even good people who look in the wrong direction. "Abraham looked for a city that hath foundations," and Moses had no easy time in trying to get the people to look at the brazen serpent that they might be healed. They looked for health and life; we "look to Jesus, the Author and finisher of our Christian faith," for salvation. Besides, we would be those who "having put our hands to the plow will not look back" lest we might be declared as unfit for the Kingdom.

It is surely well that we turn round in the observation car, changing the position of our glasses and take a look into our own hearts. We will be very apt to see some things that had been magnified too much by far. Some philosophers came along and questioned the blind man about his "lookings" and "seeings." His answer was very definite that "whereas I was blind, now I see." And it would be well to often diagnose our own case, look to self to see if we do not need a real spiritual treatment, and then look to the Great Physician, and call upon him for help. We will be sure of the effect of the healing balm. It is also very certain that if we "look into the perfect law, the law of liberty, and so continue, being not a hearer that forgetteth, but a doer that worketh, we will be greatly blessed in the doing."

When gliding over the Sea of Galilee one still sweet April morning I could but think how Peter looked at the waves instead of the Great Master of wind and wave. I know the Apostle exhorted his brethren to "look diligently lest any man fail," because he had just warned them that there was a "fearful looking for judgment and fiery eindignation." And Peter was continually impressing on his brethren that there was a coming day of the Lord that they should "look out for and be prepared for it when it did come." So Paul in his letter to Titus, kept telling his brethren to be looking for the blessed hope and appearing of the glory of the Great God and our Savior Jesus Christ." These are some of the most pointed and heart-searching of the Apastolic words. Then there are Peter's benediction and uplifting words, when he says, "according to his promise we look for new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." That is its home; it dwells there; it is not a visitor.

It is interesting to sit down with the Book in hand and look it through for the Bible records of the "looks" and "sees" that complement each other.

And how true it is in common parlance that "we can find anything we will look for!" Yes, even in our good brethren, like the young astronomer who from a stray gnat on the object glass, declared he had discovered a large animal on the moon!

Michael Angelo from a rubbish pile in his native city drew out a marble block and astonished his friends by saying he saw an angel in it. Some years ago a young Englishman went on a tiger hunt into India. He met a missionary and in conversation about their business, he said, "I have been hunting tigers here for three years and have never yet seen a native Christian." The missionary replied, "Well, I have been here three times three years, and have never seen a tiger yet." So it is with some people, they are always looking for a tiger—either a real one or a stuffed one. They might have in the perspective some larger and more noble object, but they would be sure to see the skulking, sly tiger in the copse and jungles.

You remember the old lady who wished to marry a widower, but whose children claimed that her eye-sight was so poor, that she would not know him from some other man; so a test was planned; he should mount the cupolo on the barn and she try her glasses on him. After trying different glasses she said; "I can see the man, but I can't see the barn!"

Now, I have been looking after the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST since the first morning he entered the College chapel and I gave him my hand and grip in 1865 when he had no idea of becoming either preacher or editor. In the "good old ante-bellun. days" the "Bible Advocate" was ably manned by E. L. Craig and John S. Sweeney. Bro. Sweeney swung around among the school houses and in the groves, dispensing the Gospel message, while the "Bible Advocate" made its regular visits over the prairie grass and through the golden corn and wheat fields of Illinois, bringing comfort and hope to a great, growing Christian people.

And when the "Bible Advocate" had become the "Gospel Echo," with J. C. Reynolds and J. H. Garrison as editors, and "The Christian" of Missouri joined in the wedding march, I sang, "Blest be the tie that binds."

Then came forth the compound worded Christian journal, THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST," to bear the divine message to the world, and still it comes forth with no uncertain sound, while the "Musings" and "Easy Chair" delight—so many tens of thousands of hearts in "sunrise and sunset lands." The late articles on the "New Theology" and "Higher Criticism" ring out as clear as the old "Jerusalum bell." But when I read that some good brother thinks it is time for THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to "come out square on the Bible," I wondered where this good brother has been all these years, I wondered if he had just got "square on the Bible" himself!

Now, let us stop our looking for faults in our brethren, and be "looking unto Jesus the author and perfecter of our faith," and what we can do toward the uplifting of our fellow man.

BEGAN YOUNG

Had "Coffee Nerves" from Youth.

"When very young I began using coffee and continued up to the past six months," writes a Texas girl.

"I had been exceedingly nervous, thin and very sallow. After quitting coffee and drinking Postum Food Coffee about a month my nervousness disappeared and has never returned. This is the more remarkable as I am a Primary teacher and have kept right on with my work.

"My complexion now is clear and rosy, my skin soft and smooth. As a good complexion was something I had greatly desired, I feel amply repaid even tho this were the only benefit derived from drinking Postum.

"Before beginning its use I had suffered greatly from indigestion and headache; these troubles are now unknown.

"Best of all, I changed from coffee to Postum without the slightest inconvenience, did not even have a headache. Have known coffee drinkers who were visiting me, to use Postum a week without being aware that they were not drinking coffee.

"I have known several to begin the use of Postum and drop it because they did not boil it properly. After explaining how it should be prepared they have tried it again and pronounced it delicious."

Preachers Underpaid

By Champ Clark

In my address at Sedalia last summer I dwelt somewhat extensively on the fact that we do not pay our preachers enough. Several things have happened since that to confirm me in that belief and, as the season is approaching when arrangements are made for the New Year, I write this brief epistle to jog the memory of the brethren in Missouri. At a great gathering of Congregationalists in Chicago since our Sedalia convention, it was reported that there was a shortage in preachers entering the ministry and also that several who had been preaching for years had abandoned the pulpit for secular vocations on the ground that, on their meager salaries, they could not support their families. At a Methodist Conference in Iowa in September a report of like tenor was made. Within three or four years, at least three of our preachers—good ones, too—have gone into secular pursuits in St. Louis alone—Brothers Mayhall, Hoffmann and Tyrrell. Hoffmann and Mayhall still preach Sundays, but during the week Hoffmann runs a bank and Mayhall practices law. When Brother Mayhall, one of my valued ex-constituents, concluded to begin practicing law, he frankly stated the causes which impelled him so to do and his statement increased rather than diminished the high esteem in which he is held. I am at liberty to discuss the raise in ministerial salary, because last Christmas the Bowling Green congregation of which I am a member increased by one-fifth the amount before paid to Elder Edgar M. Richmond, one of the ablest of our Missouri preachers, and the New London congregation, to which he preaches two Sundays in each month, did the same. Some may say that preachers should preach regardless of pay, for love of God. No doubt some do and some will continue to do so; but even those should be paid a living salary. The fact remains, however, that young men refuse to enter the ministry in sufficient numbers and that many quit the ministerial ranks and they do so because like the rest of us they are human and desire to see their wives and children adequately provided for; and they are right, in so desiring. Preachers are expected to dress well; to live in a respectable neighborhood; to purchase books, magazines, papers enough to keep abreast of the times; to clothe their children; and they are expected to do this on about one half of what a lawyer or doctor in the same neighborhood expends for the same purposes. This is unjust and preposterous. I have a large acquaintance among the preachers, in our own brotherhood and in other churches and among them all I do not know of one who is extravagant in his habits. Nevertheless there is not one in ten who owns his own home, or is able to lay up a dollar against the time when old age, disease or accident may stop him from preaching or to provide for his widow and orphans in the event of his own death. This surely is an unhealthy condition of affairs and should be remedied at once. It must be remedied or bright young men who are conscious of possessing faculties which will lead to success in any field of human endeavor will cease altogether to enter the ministry upon starvation salaries. Surely we do not want the ministry of the Gospel turned over wholly to dullards, and that is precisely what it will come to to a large extent, when the present generation of preachers has passed to its reward, unless we devise ways and means of giving reasonable and adequate compensation to our preachers. Our folks in Missouri are well-to-do and can afford to live up to the scriptural doctrine that the laborer is worthy of his hire.

Our One Great Peculiarity

By T. A. Abbott

Sermons without number have been preached, articles, essays, lectures, even volumes, have been written, on the "Peculiarities of the Disciples," and it would seem like presumption to add another peculiarity to that which is already so strikingly unique. Nor is it my purpose to do so, but rather to replace the emphasis that seems to have fallen from our one great "peculiarity." Is not the relation which this movement of ours sustains to the religious bodies of this land "peculiar"? In common with them we have the great purpose of bringing souls to Christ at home and abroad; we have common purpose with the in our endeavor to "build men up in their most holy faith," to develop to the full the righteous life so pleasing unto God. But is it not true that in some one thing, at least, we are unique? If not, it is high time for us to go out of business.

From the very beginning our great purpose, set forth often, with large emphasis, has been the union of the people of God. We have contended that only by such union can the world ultimately be won for our Lord. If in anything we are peculiar it is in this one thing. Sometimes the comparison is made between what we are doing in the foreign field and what other religious bodies are doing, often to our detriment and shame. But is it not true that in our endeavor to bring about the union of the people of God in our own state and our own land we are really doing the most efficient service for the lands in which men still "bow down to wood and stone"? If it is absolutely necessary in order to generate a world conquering force that God's people shall be united, there is nothing we can do that will bring a greater blessing to the heathen world than to labor earnestly that the prayer of our Lord be answered.

No other religious body on earth has this "peculiarity" as have we. Others may favor it, pray for it, long for it, yet after all it is but a "side line" with them; while with us it is an all-consuming purpose, a passion. We would not stop a single dollar, or missionary from going to the foreign field, but would increase them a thousandfold; still if our fathers were not mistaken in making this plea for union, if our whole contention in that direction is worth anything, we must spend and be spent for the consummation of this sublime purpose. It must not be relegated to second place; it must not be side-tracked for anything. This is the very heart and soul of our plea. If we forget it, if we compromise it, our glory shall be taken away and we shall come to be, indeed, "one of the denominations".

The time, we believe, is ripe for putting still greater stress on this plea for union; signs and portents full of promise are found everywhere. "Who knoweth whether thou art come to the Kingdom for such a time as this?" Certain it is that if we fail to lead in this matter of Christian union we have failed in that which is the very glory of our plea, and God will find some other people to carry on the work we so bravely began but so shamefully deserted. Truly we have a work and a responsibility at home that no other religious body has. May God help us to the performance of it.

Cheering Reports of Children's Day for Home Missions.

Receipts from children's day for home missions give promise of surpassing the record. The Broadway Church, Louisville, doubles its offering of a year ago. The Fourth Street Church, Covington, more than doubles its offering. The day was very generally celebrated, and the offerings, while not large, show signs of a growing interest. The following amounts have been received:

Norwood, O.	$ 40 00
Fourth Street, Covington, Ky.	70 00
First Church, Covington, Ky.	36 00
Walnut Hills, Cincinnati	40 00
Central Church, Indianapolis, Ind.	250 00
Evanston, Cincinnati	21 00
Lockland, O.	15 00
New Antioch, O.	20 00
Mt. Healthy, O.	25 00
Central Church, Cincinnati	25 00
St. Louis (Union Avenue)	64 00

Philadelphia, Pa. (Third Church)	139 00
Louisville, Ky. (Broadway Church)	50 00

Offering from Sunday-schools should be sent in promptly, so as not to interfere with the C. W. B. M. offering during the month of December, or any other interest of the church.

Be careful to make checks, drafts and money orders payable only to the American Christian Missionary Society, Y. M. C. A. building, Cincinnati, O.

Our Budget

—T. J. O'Connor reports a fine Bible school at Colby, Kan.

—A new foundation of rock is being put under the church at Mulkeytown, Ill.

—E. W. Yocum is in a meeting with Brother Cooper and the church at Topeka, Kan.

—B. H. Whiston is entering upon his second year with the church at Aurora, Neb., with bright prospects.

—An adult Bible class with an enrollment of thirty-two has just been organized at Koshkonong, Oregon county, Mo., where a church building is soon to be erected.

—Marcus L. Cottrell has left Lynchburg, Va., to take charge of the church at Chilhowie. He has recently been holding a few meetings in the state and reports fifty-one additions, forty by baptism.

—More than half the money necessary to provide a new building at Delphi, Ind., has been subscribed, and A. A. Honeywell, the minister, informs us that building operations will be begun in the Spring.

—J. M. Camp, of Eureka, Ill., is much praised for his work in a meeting at Atlanta, Mo., where new life was put into every department. Mrs. J. M. Moore has just organized a C. W. B. M. auxiliary there.

—The churches of Wabash county, Indiana, had their annual meeting on November 3, at the Wabash church. On the second Sunday in September of next year, they are to meet with the La Fontaine church.

—Thomas L. Cooksey has moved from Indianapolis and may be addressed now at Greenfield, Ind., in regard to meetings for 1908. This week he and Singing Evangelist Miller are in a meeting at New Richmond, Ind.

—Started as a mission twenty-one months ago, the Crawford Road Christian Church, Cleveland, O., now has the largest Bible school in the city, among our own churches. During the past year there were forty additions to this congregation.

—Edward S. McKinney reports a systematic study of the New Testament by his congregation at Woodward, Okla., in preparation for an evangelistic campaign next March. This church has a good school and Endeavor society and one of the best prayer-meetings, each week, in the state.

—"In union there is strength." W. H. Scott assigns to this fact, in a large measure, his success in a recent meeting at Eldon, Mo., where the minister had the hearty co-operation of his membership. Brother Scott will have one or two open Lord's days for the first of the year.

—At Burlington, Ind., the third building since the organization, in 1843, of our cause there, will be, before long, completed. It will cost $10,000. The congregations have been increasing in such a way as to demand this improvement. Every special offering is observed by the church there.

—The church at Pond Creek, Okla., has doubled its membership in less than six months under the ministry of Prof. O. L. Lyon, of the department of English Language and Literature in Oklahoma University, Enid, who preaches for the congregation. The Endeavor Society is supporting a native missionary in the foreign field.

—B. F. Norris, of Ashgrove, Mo., says the brethren there are well pleased with the services of David Millar, who proved himself not only a good preacher but an excellent personal worker in the meeting which he conducted for them. Brother Millar's permanent address is Bellflower, Mo., and we take pleasure in commending him.

—The roof is now on the new church at New Albany, Ind. It is expected that the Sunday-school rooms will be occupied January 1, when the Bible school revival will be begun with Miss Lemert leading. The dedication is fixed for about March 1. B. F. Cato, the minister, reports frequent additions, large congregations and everything harmonious and prosperous.

—The Bible school at Frankford, Mo., has now an average attendance of over 100. Talmage Defrees, the minister there, has been in a week's meeting at Haw Creek. He writes in very commendatory terms of E. M. Richmond and John Hulse, who have recently been in a meeting with him. Brother Hulse, he says, ought to be kept busy as a song leader by churches near his home.

—Claire L. Waite has not, as a contemporary has announced, left Milwaukee, Wis. The church there has recently rededicated its building, and will begin a series of meetings in March next with I. O. Shelburne as evangelist. The congregation has pleged $160 to state missions for the current year, and its Junior Christian Endeavor has presented the pastor with a life membership in the C. W. B. M.

—O. C. Bolman has just held a meeting at Chapin, Ill. The church now has a membership of over 250 in a town of 700, and its organization is good. Mrs. Porter, the wife of the pastor, is a great help to him. Brother Bolman is now making preparations for a meeting in Mason City in January, when J. W. Porter and C. B. Hanger will assist him. He may close his work there in March, at the end of his third year.

—John A. Stevens has held a good meeting at Erick, Okla., where two of our strong evangelists, J. L. Haddock and J. A. Minton, live. He writes that it is mainly through their sacrifice that we have a good church here. The surrounding country is "anti". Brother Stevens had to meet this at the outset, for a church of this belief had just been organized, after a three weeks' meeting. Brother Stevens has since been assisting Ellis Purlee at Coffeyville, Kan.

—The church at Olympia, Wash., where S. W. Jackson has just held a good meeting, has many loyal workers, and the pastor, W. S. Crockett, is held in the highest esteem. The church is well located and the congregation in excellent condition to do an aggressive work. Brother Jackson went from there to hold a meeting for the East Side Church. He and his wife received the warm encomiums of the brethren with whom they have been working.

—T. L. Read has just had the pleasure of revisiting the old Pleasant Ridge Church, some miles North of Lawrenceville, Ill., where he was baptized by A. Martin, some thirty-five years ago. He is expecting to have a good meeting there. Brother Morris, of Vincennes, Indiana, preaches there one-fourth of his time. Brother Read can hold one more meeting in this part of the state before going North, and refers inquirers to J. Fred Jones, the state secretary, whose headquarters are at Stanford, Ill.

—L. I. Mercer, writing of the Prairie Chapel Church, where he has just held a meeting, says it is struggling against great odds in trying to keep itself alive. The land owners in this farming district have, for the most part, moved away, and the tenants who have taken their places are not easily interested in church work or in maintaining the social standing of the community. As was pointed out in our country church number, this is one of the problems with which the country church is faced.

—Willis S. Myers was most happily surprised by his congregation at Naomi Avenue, Los Angeles. At the close of the morning service, one of the elders said he had a word to say, and, after a short speech, led the minister outside the building, and on behalf of the congregation presented him with a fine horse and surrey. This, of course, is a delightful way to treat any worthy minister, and Brother Myers will remember this birthday present which will also help him do better work during his fifth year in this pastorate.

—H. H. Clark has resigned the pastorate of the Salem, O., church of 725 members, to take up general evangelistic work, and has associated with him one of the finest singers in the brotherhood, to assist him in this work. He is now in a meeting at Mitchell, Ind., where they have a fine new church in which to hold evangelistic services. Brother Clark is highly commended by many of our leading men as a scholarly preacher and successful evengelist. We wish him the richest blessing of God in his chosen work.

—R. L. Cartwright was warmly received by the brethren at Villa Grove, Ill. Before leaving Southern Illinois he again visited the Mount Summit Church, where he recently held a meeting. Almost the entire forty-one additions he reports as actively engaged in the Lord's work. The church is anxiously looking for a minister. There are other churches in that part of the state also needing ministerial oversight. Those interested may address Joseph Husband, Chester, Ill., R. D. 2. The Pleasant Hill Church might co-operate, and inquiries with respect to it should be addressed to D. A Thompson, Ava, Ill.

—Some excellent reports were made at the annual meeting of the First Church, Bloomington, Ill., on October 3. The amount of money raised by all departments last year totaled $11,690, the largest for any year of the church's history. For missions there was contributed $1,183. The additions to the church numbered 239, the Brooks Brothers' revival bringing in 199. The present membership of the church is 1,194. This record reflects great credit upon Edgar D. Jones, the pastor. He is now, we understand, in a series of eight Sunday evening sermons on the life of Christ. This series is given under the auspices of the young people's society and is attracting large audiences.

—"Former contentions between our people and the M. E.'s have given the churches a bad reputation." This is the kind of thing that hurts church work much more than some good people imagine. We frequently get reports from brethren who write in great detail about the opposition they receive from the denominations in their meetings. We are perfectly certain that many times there is no occasion for this opposition. But just as frequently we are inclined to think there is a pugilistic spirit on the part of our own brethren when the denominations are holding their evangelistic services. Let us not be too keen to discover opposition. Much depends on the spirit in which a church and evangelist go into a meeting.

—William Thompson has just held a meeting with A. D. Finch at Stratton, Neb., where an organization was effected with thirty-nine members and a Sunday-school of forty-six members. About twenty-one years ago Brother Finch held the first meeting in an old hall in that town, but the congregation became scattered, the church building being used, for the most part, by other organizations. A move was made last year to get the members together again, but it was not successful until Brother Finch began preaching every two weeks, and arranged for this special meeting. He will continue for half the time at this point. Dr J. R. Bell was elected Sunday-school superintendent. Brother Thompson is now in a meeting at Arapahoe, Neb.

—J. J. Morgan, of the First Church, Fort Worth, has just had a surprise. During the summer he worked up union meetings between that congregation and the Tabernacle Church, which had lost its minister. Both congregations united in worship at the First Church in the morning and at the Tabernacle at night. This proved profitable to both churches. Recently the Tabernacle Church called E. M. Waits as pastor, and he and his people took possession of Brother Morgan's home one evening, and, in appreciation of the latter's services during the summer, presented to him and Mrs. Morgan some tokens of esteem, with appropriate speeches. One of the gifts was a handsome Wilton rug. The fellowship of these two congregations and their pastors is much enjoyed.

—W. H. Sheffer, pastor of the Linden Street Church, Memphis, Tenn., in writing of the meeting held there, already reported in our columns, speaks in warm terms of R. H. Crossfield and J. E. Sturgis, who did the preaching and singing. They make a great force for righteousness, he says. Brother Crossfield delivered a number of lectures on Sunday-school work that were greatly appreciated and very helpful. Before the meeting began there had been 120 additions, most of them by confession, since the first of January, making a grand total of 230 thus far this year. Brother Sheffer is now in his eighth year of service with this church. The fine address delivered by him at the Buffalo convention and reported in THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be remembered by our readers.

—The First Christian Church, Sedalia, Mo., has just had an enthusiastic annual meeting. On that occasion a debt of $4,000 which has been hanging over the church for several years, was provided for. When J. M. Rudy took up this work, the standing debt amounted to $7,000, with almost another $1,000 in floating debts. The congregation has worked hard not to in any way decrease its regular offerings and at the same time reduce the principal of the debt. The ladies' aid society was a strong factor in putting the church free from all incumbrances. It had $1,500 and with this as a nucleus the remaining indebtedness was speedily provided for at the annual meeting. During the past year the congregation has raised over $10,000 for all purposes; more, by several thousand, than any year since the present pastor began his work. Mrs. J. H. Lincoln is the president of the ladies' aid and was re-elected at the last meeting.

—J. I Williams, of Milan, Kan., writes that after leaving the Norfolk convention he returned by way of his "old Kentucky home" stopping over a week to see the old homestead where he spent his childhood days, finding many changes within the twenty-three years since he left. He says: "On Lord's day I had the great pleasure of attending the church where, over forty years ago, I obeyed the gospel under the preaching of William Rogers. The old Bere church house was built fifty years ago and has recently been remodeled. During all these years it has had a faithful band of worshippers meeting there. W. E. Mobley, who preached, has been preaching there for forty years, and the brethren still love to hear him, and were unwilling, at his suggestion, to have him resign his charge. He is now eighty-four years old. It was my privilege to preside at the communion service, and I missed many once familiar faces who have gone to join the general assembly over yonder." While the old members are passing away, there is a host of young men and women, he says, coming to take their places, and he predicts a splendid future for this old church which has "joined the great missionary host that is moving on to conquest and to victory".

— . Elwood Fisher has just entered upon his sixth year of ministry for the congregation at Fisher, Ill. He is to hold a meeting for the Bethel church, near Emden, this month. J. D. Howe leads that congregation.

—Evangelists Wilson and Linnt who have just held a good meeting for the First Church, Atlanta, Ga., are now with Richard W. Wallace and the brethren at Valdosta, where hopes are entertained for a great revival.

—R. W. Tener reports a membership of 125, with many others in prospect, at Sapulpa, Okla. While the house has been built less than two years it will have to be enlarged both for Sunday-school and church purposes.

—Charles G. Stout, one of our excellent evangelists, who has been very successful, especially in the state of Iowa, can be had for engagements, owing to some misunderstanding with reference to evangelistic services in the state of Washington during the latter part of the winter. He may be addressed at Des Moines, Ia., 1081 Twenty-fifth street.

—The Bible school contest between Cameron, Lexington and Liberty, is, according to Graham Frank, doing much for the betterment of the schools. At last report Cameron was leading by 368 points. Lexington had been hindered by an epidemic of measles. The Liberty school has just had its largest attendance with 222 pupils present and an offering of $23.50.

—Owing to an epidemic of small-pox and the closing of the big tin mills which employ some 2,000 men, Brother Sellers reports that the meeting at Elwood, Ind., has been cancelled. It was to have been conducted by Evangelists Davis and Altheide. This is a sore disappointment to the church, but may be an opportunity for some other congregation to secure an evangelist.

—Evangelist W. F. Shearer paid a pleasant visit to the office of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST last week, on his way to hold a meeting beginning Lord's day at Woodbine, Ia. The work at this place is prospering under the leadership of B. Franklin Hall. Brother Shearer, whose permanent home is Angola, Ind., has been in the evangelistic work some time now and has had such good success that he will continue.

—St. Louis churches are continuing to evangelize. L. W. McCreary held his own meeting at Hamilton Avenue and it was the best the congregation has ever experienced, fifty-three being added to the membership. E. T. McFarland and L. A. Gilliland have also held their own meetings, Singing Evangelist Sprague assisting the latter. We have no report of the additions. O. P. Spiegel has begun most auspiciously a revival for the First, and Union Avenue will follow the dedication of the fine new building with a meeting led by C. M. Chilton.

—A new mission church has been organized in the northern part of the city, at Strodtman Heights. R. H. Stockton recently purchased a lot, on condition that they would erect a building upon it. Through the co-operation of our city mission board a temporary tabernacle has been erected and was dedicated last Lord's day, J. H. Garrison preaching the sermon and afterwards raising the amount of funds necessary to pay the remaining indebtedness on the building. One of our young men, Bro. L. Hiers, is preaching for them and the outlook is good for doing a permanent work there.

—Levi Marshall, pastor of the church at Hannibal, Mo., reports a great blessing there from the visit of the Netz sisters, in a week of service which was called a fall rally. "They did us all good," he writes. "They have no superiors. We had the largest congregations ever known here in special meetings. There were a number of accessions."

Larger Bible Study and Teaching.

There is no questioning the fact of the rapid advance toward a better opportunity of Bible study on the part of the International Lesson Committee. In the meantime there is a desire to supplement these excellent lessons with a series which in a few minutes of the class recitation will afford a general and comprehensive knowledge of the whole Bible. A series of Supplemental Lessons has been prepared by the International Committee to meet this recognized need.

There is one objection which is urged against this series. It sometimes happens that the regular and the supplemental lessons are in different parts of the Bible. This is an unfortunate distraction of attention.

We desire to call attention to a system of supplemental lessons offered in our quarterlies for Bible teachers which provides for systematic study of the very books of the Bible from which the regular lessons are taken.

In this way the attention of the pupil is not distracted but assisted. Beginning January 1, for instance, the regular lessons are in the Gospel of John for six months. The supplemental lessons for this same period cover the four gospels. Every pupil in this time reads all of the four gospels, and learns the great teachings of the books, and is made acquainted with the fourfold portrait of Jesus.

The lessons are published in the quarterlies for teachers. They are carefully graded and thus adapted to the pupils of different ages. They can be taught in the first five minutes of the recitation period, and if so presented by the teacher the superintendent can sum up all the supplemental teaching in a five-minute closing review on his blackboard.

In this way the whole Bible is taught to the whole school, and in this larger teaching and study the particular Bible lesson is set in a brighter light for a clearer understanding.

These lessons appear only in our own teachers' and superintendents' quarterlies, and being published in the quarterlies are available without extra expense to the school.

It is hoped that the way can be paved for many to do a needed service with our smaller churches.

THE DIAMOND ANNIVERSARY AT BEDFORD, OHIO

There are few, if any, churches among us that have as rich a history as the church at Bedford, O. It is a place of about 3,500 people, eleven miles from the public square of Cleveland. November 14-17 marked the date of the diamond anniversary of this church. It was organized in 1832 by William Hayden. There were twenty charter members—ten men and ten women. For twenty-four years there was no regular preacher. But in these days there were many who preached at various times and held meetings. Dr. Robison, who became such a figure in Western Reserve history, was an early convert and preached for the Bedford church a great deal. His famous Bible class is recalled by many to-day, who put it as one of the greatest Bible classes ever taught by any man. In May, 1856, J. O. Beardsley came to preach regularly for the church. He has an interesting history. He was in the first class that ever graduated from Oberlin College. He went to Jamaica as a missionary, but after a time returned. His Bible study had led him to some new ideas. A Congregational church in East Cleveland extended him a call. He set forth his new views in his first sermon and the call was withdrawn. That night he went to hear A. S. Hayden. He soon found that he was in perfect accord with Mr. Hayden. Very soon after he came to Bedford as minister.

The anniversary began on Thursday night, November 14, with a fellowship meeting. Local pastors and churches of Cuyahoga county were asked to bring greetings. Friday night Mrs. Julia C. Gerould, of Cleveland, spoke on "The Bedford Church and Its Missionaries." The accompanying pictures show who they are and where they work. For many years Mrs. Gerould was a member of the Bedford church. Indeed, it was here that she first met Dr. Gerould. She was the first primary teacher in the Sunday-school. Saturday night James Vernon, of Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Davis, Mandah, India.

Winchester, Ind., a former pastor, preached a sermon on "Memory," that was well wrought out and very helpful.

Sunday, November 17, was the high day. People came from far and near. The house was packed all day. E. W. Libbey, one of the elders, read the history of the church. It was finely presented. His preliminary remarks, apparently given extemporaneously, were wonderfully rich. A memorial poem was given by Mrs. C. D. Hubbell. Orlow C. Hubbell came from Nebraska for the anniversary and his address on Sunday morning left no doubt as to the motive that prompted him to come so far. His is a very happy faculty in public address. Between two and three hundred people were served with dinner at the church on Sunday.

Church of Christ, Bedford, Ohio.

The afternoon was given entirely to reminiscences, with such men as Lathrop Cooley, F. M. Green, E. J. Robison, L. H. Bush, E. E. Curry, A. B. Griffith, C. A. Ennis, O. J. Hubbell, O. M. Benedict, B. A. Robinett, et al., to talk. Robert Moffett, who served the church five years, was not able to be present, but sent his message to be read. At night Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, editor of the "Missionary Tidings," spoke on "The Forward Look." It was a characteristic address, well made and well given and timely.

One speaker estimated that over 13,000 people have been brought to Christ by those who have gone out from this church. It was also stated that from at least fifty families college students have come. It is pretty safe to say that Hiram has graduated more students from the Bedford church than any church in the state. The Bedford church today evidently has more college people in its membership, in proportion to its members, than any church in the state outside of a college town.

It has always stood for the highest culture and has yielded a large fruitage in those

NEWS FROM MANY FIELDS

Ohio.

I. J. Cahill has been in quite a successful meeting at Carlisle, Ky., with E. J. Willis.—— O. H. Bartlett assisted A. J. Sever and the Mentor church in a two-weeks' meeting between Sundays. There was one confession.——W. H. Oldham has taken the work at Sebring recently resigned by Homer Sala. Brother Oldham comes from the Second Church, East Liverpool.—— T. A. Armstrong, of North Eaton, is helping N. T. Sims and the Sullivan Church in an evangelistic effort. This is an exchange meeting and Brother Sims will "pay back" a little later.—— H. C. V. Wilson, of Mt. Victory and Big Springs, has accepted a call to the South Church in Lima, recently vacated by George Sims.—— Chester Sprague will leave East Liberty about December 1 and go to a warmer climate. He feels he can not stand the rigorous winter weather of Central Ohio. Brother Sprague is a fine preacher and a noble Christian man and we shall hope for a worthy work in a new field.——P. H. Welsheimer and the Canton Church will have an eight-day revival beginning December 3. They will put all energy into this effort and are expecting large results. The Netz sisters will sing.

President Bates came over from New York November 5 to visit Hiram and meet the trustees of the college at Cleveland to lay some plans for the future work of the school. The faculty, students and townspeople of Hiram gave Brother Bates a great reception. Old residents say they have not seen such a demonstration at Hiram since the day Garfield came back to Hiram after he had been nominated for President. The alumni of Cleveland and vicinity also gave President Bates a banquet and reception at the Euclid Avenue Church Thursday night, November 7.

The preachers of Cleveland were addressed by a Congregational minister on Monday, November 18, on "The Ground of Final Authority in Religion." If any man in the country has swallowed higher criticism in its extreme conclusions more thoroughly and followed his teachers to the very end of their logic, more fully than this man, he is to be pitied. If he represents any great number of his fellow-ministers, it is no wonder that the Congregationalists reported a decrease in churches and communicants at their last triennial council. It is both ridiculous and pathetic to hear a man denounce and decry others for being narrow, rutty and slaves to tradition, etc., and at the same time by his own vocabulary and phraseology demonstrate that he is but a parrot piping what he has read and heard from his teachers. We would not by any means be understood as condemning higher criticism entirely. But a few fellows that are so very high up in the air need to have a few feathers of their wings plucked out that they may get down to earth again. Blessed is the man who can keep in the middle of the road and feed the people to whom he ministers oats instead of shoe-pegs and sawdust.

The account of the Norfolk convention as given by THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST was the very best that has ever been put out among us by any paper. It would have meant much to our brotherhood if copies of those issues could have been in every home in all our churches. The spirit of the Norfolk convention has done even those of us who were not there much good. It is comforting and assuring to know that we have such big-hearted and broad-minded men to lead our national assemblies. May we all thank God and take courage. C. A. Freer.

The Owensboro (Ky.) Meeting.

Our church is rejoicing over the recent meeting in which John L. Brandt and J. E. Sturgis led our forces to victory. There were 175 additions in all; of this number 120 made confession and were baptized, and 190 were men and women. The results are easily the largest in the history of the congregation, and give us a membership of about 1,000. To be brief, I shall itemize the leading factors producing these results: (1) The preaching by Brother Brandt was up to a high standard of efficiency, and manifested the true evangelistic spirit throughout. Professor Sturgis in leading the chorus-choir and in rendering solos is capable, consecrated and tactful. (2) The church was well prepared for the effort. All departments were efficiently organized. We had been having additions at almost every Sunday service during the year. The missionary spirit was vigorous. The church had recently put itself on record almost to a man as favoring civic righteousness and opposed to the saloon. Perfect unity existed all along the line. (3) The Sunday-school furnished 120 of the 175 additions. Thirty came from the Twentieth Century men's class. (4) Much time and money were devoted to advertising the meeting. (5)

Christian Church, Owensboro, Ky.

The Sunbeam choir, composed of 85 boys and girls from 6 to 16 years of age, made the Friday evening meetings very attractive. (6) A large number of the members did personal work during the invitation. A majority came forward as the result of such effort. (7) The meeting was short, only three weeks; yet this fact contributed to its power. By laying aside all possible duties the church accomplished in twenty-one days what ordinarily requires twice the time.

East Washington.

Most of our churches are supplied with good men. While our effort for a general co-operative evangelistic effort has not resulted in much, there has been awakened a general movement toward evangelistic work. The churches at Dayton, Garfield and Colfax are about to complete arrangements to call Byron C. Platt, of Marion, O., for an evangelistic campaign. They are looking for a fourth church that will agree to call him for a meeting in April. Brother Piatt will bring his singer. Those of our churches that can assist these churches by calling Brother Piatt in April should notify W. H. Harris, or the corresponding secretary at office. A. A. Doak, of Oakesdale, has offered to hold a meeting for one of our East Washington churches and turn the proceeds into the state work. Latah has accepted the offer.

The corresponding secretary has met with a splendid reception. The ideals and methods adopted at Palouse have received an enthusiastic approval, and response has been general. If the present financial troubles continue a great hardship will be worked on the state cause; our brethren must come forward with determined and self-sacrificing support, because of the present stress, or the work must stop.——In connection with the January meeting of the state board in Walla Walla, a conference and rally has been planned which will last over a day and two nights. All the East Washington churches are invited.——The cause at Colville, the present protege of the state board, is making splendid progress. A good house is about enclosed. We have church buildings east from the Cascades—North Yakima, Sunnyside, Dayton, Union Park, Spokane and New Colville. E. F. Beaudreau is preaching for Medical Lake, and Greenacres; M. W. Smith for Rockford and Cheney; J. F. Rice is located with Rosalia; he is from Ontario, Canada; R. E. Jope, of California, is at Garfield; G. M. Read has accepted a call for full time with Washtucna; L. P. Schooling, of Chicago, is with the Pullman church; N. S. McCallum is supplying for Lind and Cunningham until they find a pastor; Evangelist F. A. Ware is in a meeting at Lind, after which he goes to a neighborhood near Cunningham; the three churches in Spokane will unite in an evangelistic effort with the Brooks brothers in March. We gladly welcome our new men to our great state.——We are in great need of four or five strong preachers to fill good pulpits. A good salary is assured. They must be men of strong faith, pious and energetic, and of at least ordinary pulpit ability. Our western preachers must be rustling pastors to succeed. Persistent, energetic, pastoral work is the order of the day with every successful preacher in the Northwest. He "must endure hardship." But such a one will find an inviting, inspiring field in east Washington, and he will succeed.

J. A. Pine, Cor. Sec.

Texas Missions.

We made an encouraging gain in receipts for state missions the first week in November. Since then no gains over last year have been made. We hope this only means a more earnest effort for a large state mission offering. We can not now afford to fall behind. Our plans are for a forward movement. We can not now retreat. We have about perfected arrangements whereby we shall place a German missionary in South Texas by January 1. We have a large and growing German population in Texas. These, too, must be evangelized.

At the Bowie District convention Evangelist J. B. Faulkner made an excellent report and was continued in the field for another year.——The Temple District convention was held at Temple, November 9-11. J. H. McWhirter was engaged as district evangelist and is now at work in that field.——The Hillsboro District convention will meet with the Oak Cliff Church December 3-5. A large and enthusiastic convention is expected. Evangelist A. D. Rogers will have perhaps the best report ever made in any of our district conventions. Let every church be represented.

At Stratford on November 17 the writer assisted Pastor L. G. Ament to dedicate to the service of God a beautiful $4,800 church building, well adapted to its purpose. He raised $700 at the morning service. At night a good offering for state missions was made. Brother Ament preaches for two county seats thirty miles apart. A good home for the preacher and his family has been secured at Dalhart. Brother and Sister Ament are doing faithful and substantial work in the great Southwest. J. C. Mason.

A New Zealand Letter.

In two more weeks the writer expects to close his labors in New Zealand and take his departure to Australia. How long I may remain in that country is not yet determined. The Lord must dispose of my remaining days as he may think best. I have been called to labor for the church at Lismore, New South Wales, Australia, and this will be my permanent address until further notice be given. When through at Lismore, be the time long or short, I expect, the Lord willing, to resume my journey round the world, visiting Egypt, Palestine, Europe, England and Scotland. It is possible that I may not reach America until the time of the convention at Pittsburg, which I hope to attend.

There is so much need of preachers in these countries I feel most reluctant to leave them while the Lord gives me strength to do successful work among the churches. I have now been over two years in beautiful New Zealand, and the longer I remain the better do I like the country and its loyal British people. The thought of parting with them gives me inward pain. The greater part of my work has been done in Wellington, the capital city, and for the Vivian Street Church—until last Lord's day known as the Dixon Street Church of Christ. It is the mother church of all the churches in the vicinity of Wellington, and is composed of as devoted and self-sacrificing men and women as can be found on this globe.

When I came to Wellington I found them in a poor building, with some debt on it; in a very bad location, and laboring under some other discouragements; I now leave them in one of the best church buildings in the city, in a splendid location, and L. F. Stephens and wife beginning a meeting which will likely continue eight weeks. The new building was formally set apart for worship on September 22. The building is the best and most commodious house of worship owned by the brotherhood in New Zealand, and as far as I can learn has no superior in Australia. It has a complete basement for the Sunday-school, the size of the auditorium and nearly all of the modern conveniences found in the best churches. An audience of 700 can be accommodated on special occasions. The plan for the building throughout is largely my own.

A. B. Maston, the most widely known preacher in the Australian brotherhood, passed to his reward August 28, after years of intense suffering with cancer in his face. He came to Wellington from Indiana, in 1880, and labored upwards of four years for the church which I am now leaving. From Wellington he went to Tasmania, where he labored one year for the church in Hobart. Since then he lived and labored in Melbourne, Australia, until the time of his death. For about ten years he was editor of the "Australian Christian," the church organ of our brotherhood in these colonies. A short time before his death, and while he was on a bed of intense suffering, the handsome sum of $3,000 was raised by the churches, and presented to him for the support of his family, and as a token of appreciation of the sacrifices he had made for the cause of Christ in these British colonies.

Ambitious and plucky New Zealand is no longer to be known simply as a colony. Henceforth she is to be known as "The Dominion of New Zealand." On September 26 I had the very great pleasure of witnessing the ceremonies and of listening to a proclamation which effected this change. Hugh T. Morrison.

Nebraska.

D. G. Wagner, formerly of Chester and recently of Mt. Morris, Ill., has accepted a call to the Ansley Church and will begin early in December. He is at present visiting at Chester.——Joel Brown has been at Cook in a meeting.——Friends of G. J. Chapman, for several years pastor at York, will be glad to know that he is prospering in his new work at Cherokee, Okla. He expects to build a larger house next year.——A teacher- training class of 50 is being organized at Norfolk. The Bible school enrolls 100, and the home department numbers 63 and is growing. Dr. O. R. Meredith is the superintendent and John L. Stine the pastor. This is a mission of the state.——H. F. Stevens, preacher at Elwood, reports a training class of 15 in that earnest little church.——Harry Knowles preached at South Omaha on November 24, and reports two confessions.——George C. Aydelotte and wife were to begin a meeting at Wymore, where Jean Cobbey preaches, December 1. Homer Young will also assist and they are preparing for a great meeting.——R. D. McCance is now in a meeting at DeWitt endeavoring to plant the cause there. We have a few brethren there.——O. A. Adams is at Mason City and Brother Gregg still at Nemaha. Brother Gregg goes next month to Indianola.

Reports from the churches on the matter of the state apportionment show an increase over the same period last year of $108. The student preachers of Cotner are showing exceptional earnestness and effectiveness in this campaign. They have brought up the apportionments in most cases and the number attending to it in November is larger than ever. Most of our largest churches are engaged in special work, so that the returns come from the smaller and the middle sized churches. This makes the outlook all the brighter for a generous offering. Let us keep at it. The churches that have failed to get it in November should take steps to bring it up in December, so that we can have a decisive report to make to the board meeting the first days of January.

This work of evangelizing Nebraska is one that should appeal to every church. None that have services are too weak to send an offering in some amount, and many that have been giving sparingly can now well afford to take their places among those who give to the full of the apportionments asked, or more. We ought to have exceeded last year's receipts from apportionments $500. The evangelistic committee met last week and planned the work for our two evangelists for two months ahead. The calls exceed that, but the others will come in order. One place is a new one entirely and if we can arrange it so we will have an organization there before the close of the missionary year. Let us be about this business as though we meant it.

West Virginia.

The work of the evangelists of the West Virginia C. M. S. during the month of October was very gratifying. We now have three men in the field supported wholly by the state society. Two others are supported in conjunction with the A. C. M. S. The three report fifty accessions during the month.——E. H. Hart has taken the work at Williamson. This is a mission point. A building will be erected as soon as possible. The interest is growing.——Richie Ware, minister at Beckley, recently assisted A. H. Jordan in a meeting at Friendly. One addition resulted.——Homer Sala, of Sebring, O., is in a meeting with C. M. Small at Fairview. Six additions to date.——State missionary rallies were held at Wheeling, Shinnston and New Martinsville, recently. John G. Slayter, Pittsburg, addressed the Wheeling rally.——The Sistersville church, A. H. Jordan, minister, is in a good meeting. Miss Bessie Sadler, Point Marion, Pa., has charge of the music. There have thus far been 27 accessions.——J. Ronald Glenn has resigned at Charleston to enter Bethany College. He will preach for the Second Church of East Liverpool, O., during his term in college. Charleston is looking for a good minister.——The First Church, Wheeling, is in a series of evangelistic meetings, assisted by Homer Cole as singer. This church is doing a good work under the ministry of W. H. Fields.——The wedding bells are to ring for two of our most promising young ministers at Christmas.——A new watchword has been added to the aims of the West Virginia C. M. S. It is: "Twenty-five young men from our churches studying for the ministry in 1909."——J. Greene McNeely is in an interesting meeting at Holden. This is the finest mining town in the state. We have no organization there.——Montgomery wants a minister. Write G. F. Crites, Montgomery, W. Va.——The Island Church, Wheeling, is having a series of missionary addresses. President McLean, Professor W. B. Taylor, Dr. Royal Dye and Secretary H. A. Denton are the speakers.——Moody Edwards, a Bethany student, will preach for the Palestine church one-fourth time.——Wanted: Five men who will give $100 each to West Virginia missions this year. This is a great investment. The dividends are assured. Read the Master's guarantee, Luke 6:38.

Dependable Books

—The Twentieth Century New Testament. This new translation gives us the treasures of the New Testament in the English words, phrases and idioms of every-day life, and the reader is held by a peculiar charm of absolute freshness. It is steadily growing in favor wherever the New Testament is loved, read and studied. $1.00.

—Life That Follows Life. By John Balcom Shaw. "This is no volume of philosophical speculation, but the answer which Dr. Shaw, as a man of sanity and Christian faith, gives to the plain questions which the children of men ask about the hereafter. To the direct questions—Where is heaven?—Shall we recognize our loved ones?—How shall we get along with uncongenial people? etc., he gives answers without equivocation, stating plainly his convictions. Especially interesting are the chapters on the five minutes before and after death.' $.75.

—Winsome Womanhood. By Margaret E. Sangster. A most appropriate Christmas present for your sister, mother or wife. All Christian womanhood is winsome, but herein this gifted writer holds forth an ideal that will lure all readers to higher levels of thought and action and being. The book is now in more than 50,000 homes. It is attractively bound. It will be mailed to you on receipt of $1.25.

—The Authority of Christ. By David W. Forest of Edinburg. 'It appears to me that those who maintain a genuine historical incarnation of the Son of God have not always sufficiently recognized the limitations in an incarnate life, nor how vital is the illumination of the Spirit, operating through the best activities of men's minds and hearts, for the discovery of what Christ's authoritative message really is." Among the chapters are, "The recognition of Christ as the Incarnate Son;" "Christ's authority on individual duty;" "Christianity and the State;" "The Incarnation and the Holy Spirit." $2.00.

—The Influence of the Holy Spirit in Conversion. A debate between Rev. Asa Sluth of the Methodist Episcopal Church and Elder J. W. Randall of the Christian Church. This debate attracted great attention at the time it was held. The arguments for and against the position that the Scriptures teach the direct influence of the Holy Spirit in conversion are ably stated and confuted. $1.00.

—Leaves From Mission Fields. By N. M. Ragland. This charming book of 273 pages consists of memoirs of the distinguished missionaries Mrs. Harriet Newell, Mrs. Ann Judson, Miss Mattie L. Judson, Mrs. Josephine Smith and Charles E. Garst. It is bound to create great interest in missions in the heart of every reader. $1.00.

—Encyclopedia of the Evidences; or Masterpieces of Many Minds. By J. W. Monser. This great book should be in the study of every preacher and other defenders of their common faith. Its massed arguments in favor of the doctrine of God's immanence in his world, miracles, inspiration, divinity of Christ and immortality dispel all skepticism pertaining to these eternal verities. Cloth, $2.00; sheep, $2.50.

We recommend each of these to our patrons.

BALE.

George W. Bale was born in Stark county, Ohio, November 7, 1834; died at his home in Iowa City, Ia., October 18, 1907. He came to Iowa in 1856, and located in Johnson county, where he resided until about a year ago when he moved to Iowa City. He was married to Miss Charlotte Morgan in 1850. Six children were born to them—two of whom, Edita and Alvin, preceded their father to the heavenly home. The funeral was held from the family residence on South Dodge street, October 20, conducted by Percy Leach, his late pastor, and T. J. Dow, of Minneapolis, a former pastor. The services were largely attended by neighbors and friends from the country. In the death of Mr. Bale Johnson county loses one of its most highly esteemed citizens, and the church a devoted member. He was a charter member of the Christian Church in Iowa City, had served the church as elder for a long period of years, and was one of its most faithful and exemplary members. In his demise the church sustains an irreparable loss. His life was a benediction to all who knew him. He was the soul of honor and honesty. In him the attributes of Christian manhood were most harmoniously blended. His life is a legacy of inestimable value he has bequeathed to his family as a heritage. Four of the children share the bereavement with their mother—W. G. Bale, of Winnipeg, Manitoba; George W. Bale, of Estherville, Ia.; Bert F. Bale and Mrs. Anna M. Spencer, both of Johnson county, Iowa. A large circle of friends sympathize with the bereaved family. T. J. Dow.

BUXTON.

Died in Worcester, Mass., October 15, 1907, Mrs. Eva Smythe, wife of A. L. D. Buxton, at the age of 53 years, 2 months and 10 days. Mrs. Buxton was a life-long member of the Church of Christ in Worcester, having united with the church when 8 years of age and two years after its organization. Her father, W. A. S. Smythe, was a charter member of the Worcester church and one of its first elders. Mrs. Buxton was a consecrated Christian, devoted to every good work of the church and was known throughout the city for her deeds of benevolence. She was beloved by both old and young and will be universally missed. She was, for many years, president of the auxiliary to the C. W. B. M., and was one of its most active members. Her activity in the work of the Ladies' Aid Society was an inspiration to her co-workers and the remarkable success of that organization was largely due to her untiring and cheerful efforts. Many of the present members of the church obtained their first knowledge of the Bible in the Sunday-school class which she faithfully taught for so many years. Her deep spirituality was always an inspiration in the devotional services of the church. She was a member of the executive board of the Y. W. C. A. and was also vice-president of the ladies' auxiliary to the Y. W. C. A. She died after a lingering illness of six weeks, from the effects of a stroke of apoplexy. She is survived by her husband and four sons.
Worcester, Mass. Harry Minnick.

ERB.

Gleason Fillmore Erb was born in Clarence, N. Y., March 26, 1838, and died from consumption in Buffalo, N. Y., November 9, 1907. While he was yet a young man he gave his heart to Christ. For many years he was a deacon of the church at Lancaster, N. Y. In 1866 he was married to Margaret R. Baker. Three children were born to them, and these with the wife and mother and one sister survive him. For forty years he was a prosperous farmer at Bowmansville, N. Y. Ten years ago he left the exacting labors of the farm and moved with his family to the home he had prepared for them in Buffalo. He was an active and beloved member of the Richmond Avenue Church.

GRAY.

Mary B. Gray answered the call to the higher service October 18, 1907. She was a devout lover of God's word and his work. Her high ideals and admirable qualities of heart endeared her to all. May the Heavenly Father comfort the aged husband, four sons and two daughters and other dear ones, and help us all to walk closer to the Master whom she loved and followed.
Berry, Ill. Mrs. M. L. Gaddis.

HOLBROOK.

Florence May Holbrook was born May 2, 1907, and died August 11, 1907. Funeral conducted by Francis M. Biddle, minister of the Central Christian Church, at the home of her parents, New Castle, Pa.

McCURDY.

Joseph M. McCurdy died at Penalosa, Kan., October 26, 1907, in the seventy-second year of his age. He had been a resident of this community up to four years ago when he went west with his family. The remains were brought to Bunker Hill, Ill., for burial. The writer preached the funeral sermon and was assisted by Mr. Judd, pastor of the Baptist Church. A little less than a year ago I preached the funeral sermon of Sister McCurdy in the same town and in the same church. J. E. Masters.
Dorcester, Ill.

MILLS.

Edward P. Mills, aged 79 years, died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. William Duzenberry, Sawtelle, Cal., after a lingering illness. The interment took place with military honors at the home cemetery. Brother Mills served during the Civil War in Company H, Eleventh Indiana Cavalry. He was a man of exemplary character and will be greatly missed.

NEELY.

John Neely died at his home at Hagans, W. Va., September 30, 1907, at the age of 79 years and 26 days. In his death the Christian church at Hagans has lost one of its most faithful members, and the community one of its most noble citizens. He leaves a family of nine children to mourn his loss. All are members of the Christian Church. George H. Ellis, minister.

SAUNDERS.

Samuel T. Saunders was born in Nicholas county, Kentucky, June 20, 1837, and died near Urbana, Ia., October 22, 1907. In 1844 he went with his parents to Boone county, Indiana, and located near Lebanon. Here he grew to manhood. In early youth he became a member of the Church of Christ there. On September 27, 1866, he was married to Lucy J. Wilson. Six children were born to this union, three of these preceding the father to the better land. In 1868 he came with his family to Benton county, Iowa, locating near Urbana, where he has since resided, with the exception of four years. Two sons, a daughter, the faithful wife and two brothers, with many relatives and friends, mourn their loss; yet not as those who have no hope, for we believe that with him all is well. The funeral services were conducted by Elder A. B. Elliot, of Vinton, October 24, 1907. He was one of God's noblemen. Malcolm McNie.

He was a charter member of the Christian Church at this place and filled the office of deacon from the beginning. He was the ninth descendant of William Brewster, of the Mayflower, and possessed in full measure the rugged Puritanical principles of truthfulness and honesty. After an hour of suffering from rheumatism of the heart he died November 11, 1907. The funeral service was conducted by the writer.

He was married to Miss Lou Lasley on October 23, 1889, who, with two adopted sons and three sisters, survive him. He had been a true and consistent member of the Christian Church for many years. Funeral services were conducted by J. H. Wood, of Shelbina.

WOODWARD.

George Woodward died July 10, 1907, aged 84 years. He was born in Canandaigua, N. Y. When quite young he moved with his parents to Newburg, O., and there, when 18 years of age, united with the church. He was married to Leora H. Warren in 1850. In 1865 he moved to Wauseon, O., where for twenty-five years he served in the church as Sunday-school superintendent, deacon and elder. In 1885 he moved to Cleveland, O., and united with the Euclid Avenue Church, to which he was faithful to the end. He leaves a wife and four children. He was a sturdy yet sunny Christian, practicing the gospel of good cheer. J. H. Goldner.

Baptists-Disciples.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

Allow me in response to O. P. Spiegel's notice in the current issue, of previous articles of mine, under the above caption, to admit that his chances of observation have been greater than mine, although mine have not been confined to "Sand Mountain," and I rejoice that his view is more hopeful than mine. I fear, though, that he is an "Opossumist" and is letting on a little, or at least an optimist whose wishes are father to his thought. Perhaps the judgment of a disinterested "foreigner" is more to be relied on than that of an interested native. Brother Spiegel of all men has labored to unite his own brethren in the South, and with considerable success, and I know of no better man to inaugurate an aggressive campaign of unity between them and the Baptists. I herewith appoint him apostle (excuse the "hyperbole" (?)) to bring these Baptist wanderers into the one fold.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

Unless my memory be in error it was my privilege, pleasure or duty—perhaps all three—to indite an inspired epistle to thee just about one year ago, sitting at this same table in the quiet writing room of this well appointed hotel; the subject matter of that inspiration being Hats, large Hats, fluffy Hats, women's Hats in our churches!

Now the spirit of inspiration has not seized me again, in an annual visit, so to speak; on the contrary, I feel quite natural, and this letter is intended to briefly state a deep impression made upon my plastic mind this Lord's day morning—and quite early in the morning at that; for be it known unto thee, most worthy Editor, that I disentangled myself from the arms of Morpheus at an early hour this bright and beautiful Lord's day morning for the express purpose of going somewhere to worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness. I have gotten into this habit through many years of training and practice, and I never feel just right if I fail to begin each week in this way.

There's a reason, and several of them, why I never absent myself from the Lord's house at the appointed times of worship; but to the point of this letter.

I left my hotel at 9:30 this morning and walked briskly up Fifth avenue towards Central Park. As I reached Fiftieth street I found myself opposite the great Catholic Cathedral and for a moment I paused and noticed how few people there were in the streets. I was impressed with the stillness and lack of life and bustle, which is, ordinarily, a part of Fifth avenue. I stepped upon a raised platform in front of a new building extending over the sidewalk and looked directly across the street at the silent, massive walls of the Cathedral, from which no sound came.

As I gazed, suddenly, as if by magic, the great doors of the cathedral swung open and from them poured a stream of human beings; tens, twenties, hundreds; yes, thousands poured forth from the exits on Fifth avenue, Fiftieth and Fifty-first streets.

I stood motionless and watched this noiseless, surging crowd of worshipers for several minutes, and as I looked upon them—men, women and children, from every walk in life, I said to myself, "What a wonderful sight; behold the power of habit. It is as natural for these people to go to their church thus early in the morning as it is for them to go to their places of business, schools and household duties to-morrow."

Then I thought of the earlier services, perhaps one at 5, one at 6, one at 7, one at 8, now this one at 9, and all well attended no doubt, and others yet to follow.

I walked on but a few blocks, then decided to retrace my steps, and in doing so I passed the same spot about fifteen minutes later, and saw hundreds and thousands of people pouring into the sanctuary from whence the others had just come out. I confess I was deeply impressed at this uncommon sight, and I think I learned anew a valuable lesson.

Now, let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter. We Protestants have formed a bad habit of getting up too late on Sunday mornings, and for that reason many do not attend Bible school at all, and some others are not present at the morning services of the church. My brother, "these things ought not so to be," and we must do better in the future.

All through our brotherhood we are making a determined effort to increase our Bible school attendance, especially the adult classes, and the only way we can possibly succeed is to "Get the Habit" our Catholic friends have acquired; rise early on the morning of each Lord's day, and be one of a great procession upon whose banner is inscribed, "I was glad when they said unto me, let us go up to the house of the Lord!"

Solomon said, "with all thy getting, get understanding," and I am not sure but that he or even a greater one would say, "with all thy getting, get the habit."

Thanking thee for thy patience, I am sincerely, W. Daviess Pittman.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

I have read your editorial, "A Positive Creed With Some Negations," with much interest and with hearty approval. The people will always, I believe, welcome positive preaching. Our negations are matters for private conversation in the "enquiry room," and for addresses at "Congresses" and ministerial associations, but they are not material for preaching. Preaching has to do with positives and not negatives; when it begins to deal with negatives, except in the most casual way and to make room for the positives which immediately follow, it ceases to be preaching. If brethren who look at the world from the point of view of modern science, and at the Bible from the point of view of modern criticism, and at Christ from the point of view of the New Theology, find that their own faith is thereby quickened and their horizon enlarged and that they are possessed of a new spiritual and social dynamic, then let them preach with a deeper conviction and devote themselves to their ministry as prophets of God with more patience and love and human sympathy. The people are not interested in our science or our criticism, and do not care whether our theology be old or new; what they are interested in, and that supremely, is to know that our faith is real and our sympathies human.

Faithfully yours, E. M. Todd.

Effective Men in Demand.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

In a recent editorial on "A Positive Creed with Some Negations," you speak so to the point that I want to congratulate you.

It is the positive message of faith in Christ that our brethren want. As ministers we must not be oversensitive about what we believe or do not believe to be true in the realm of opinion. The man who can do things for the kingdom will have no trouble finding a place to work. This is all nonsense about men being crowded out of our ministry. There are cases, as you say, where men spend much time exploiting opinions held by many of our people or in endeavoring to establish new opinions of no more worth where the good old elders get tired of it and spank the boy; then there are cases where men spend so much time in speculating that they have none for the needful work of the ministry; but effective men are in demand

Truly yours, S. S. Lappin.

Stanford, Ill.

[We must admit also, must we not, that there are cases where the "good old elders" are impervious to new truths which they would be the better for receiving, and cause trouble by their intolerance. Such cases, however, will be rare where the preacher is discreet, and lays due emphasis on the undisputed revelation. As a rule the preacher who does things, as our correspondent says, will be in demand.—EDITOR.]

The Boy Samuel.—1 Sam. 3:1-21.

Memory verses, 8-10.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Speak, Lord; for thy servant heareth.—1 Sam. 3:9.

Scarcely another man in the whole course of Hebrew history, unless it be Moses, combined within his own person as many different functions as did Samuel. He lived at one of the turning points of the nation's history, when the old regime of tribal independence and the haphazard system of government under the judges was giving way before the tendency to unify the whole people under a single government and to establish fixed and permanent governmental institutions. Samuel was trained to perform the offices of the priesthood as he ministered at the sanctuary at Shiloh in his childhood. After the death of Eli, he served virtually as high priest and as general religious leader of the people. After the overthrow of the Philistines he acted as judge over Israel, and for the better administration of justice he arranged a sort of circuit among the towns of Bethel, Gilgal and Mizpah,—the first circuit court on record. Although opposed to the establishment of the monarchy, he was the instrument through which it was accomplished and by him the first two kings were anointed.

Samuel was a Nazarite. See 1 Sam. 1-11, and compare Num. 6:1-5.

Shiloh was at this time the principal place of worship in Israel, but it was not necessarily the only one. The books of Judges and 1 Samuel contain numerous references to the erection of altars and the offering of sacrifices at other places.

Hannah's song in chapter 2 is a fine example of one type of Hebrew poetry. It would be well worthy of a place in the book of Psalms. The Hebrew language lends itself with singular felicity to this sort of spontaneous poetry. With us, poetry must always be, in its form, a somewhat artificial mode of expression. It is obviously premeditated. But in Hebrew, impassioned utterance whether of joy or sorrow, penitence or praise, always tended to assume the poetic form. The absence of the artificial devices of rhyme and meter made this possible.

Eli was the chief priest at the sanctuary at Shiloh, and his two sons were also priests. Evidently their priesthood was determined by heredity and not by fitness, for as a matter of fact they were unfit. Whenever office passes from father to son, there is danger of degeneration. This is especially true of religious office. The Roman Catholic hierarchy has at some periods been woefully corrupt, but it is nothing compared with what it would have been if the priesthood had been made hereditary.

The vision of warning came to Samuel. It did not come to Eli, although in a way Eli was more directly concerned with it. Eli had the age, the experience, the dignity, the office, the learning; but Samuel had the vision. In that fact lay Samuel's advantage. The word of the Lord had become rare and visions infrequent, for no other reason, doubtless, than that there was no one who could properly receive them. Eli was good, but he was past the point of receiving new messages from the Lord. Some men never become too old to learn, and some are born so. But whatever be the cause, when that time comes, when the ear is no longer keen and the eye open to catch the message which comes from God, the day of usefulness is past. Here it was the sensitive soul of a child, devoted to the idea of doing his duty in ministering to the priests in the sanctuary, which was better prepared than the priests themselves to receive the word of the Lord.

Listening through the night for the voice of Eli, Samuel heard the voice of God. So many a man by diligently seeking the less has found the greater blessing. The man who is doing his small duty is in the way of receiving any large blessing which is in store for him. No man ever hears the voice of God unless he is paying diligent heed to all the voices of earth to which it is his business to pay attention.

Confident Testimony.

T. Confession and Salvation.	Rom. 10:8-11.
F. Confession and Courage.	Mark 8:34-38.
S. A Good Confession.	Acts 7:51-60.
S. Topic.

Every young disciple is confronted with the duty of testifying for Christ. The manner in which this testimony can and must be offered is frequently a perplexing question. Very few young people are otherwise than truly loyal to Christ. Most of them have the duty of testifying urged upon them at times in a way which seems to suggest that they are evading a confession in their faith and love. How can a young disciple be confident of his faith, how can such a Christian Endeavorer testify?

One of the most confident confessions in the New Testament is that of Paul in his saying, "I know him whom I have believed." We all wish to have such a confidence. How can it come to us?

It will come through our increasing knowledge of Christ and growth in grace. But how do these come? In the New Testament we have in the first four books four character studies of Jesus, that we may be able to answer the question, Who is he? The disciple of Jesus reads them with increasing delight and ever widening knowledge and deepening understanding. Over and over one should read these gospels, asking all the time for fuller understanding. The result can not be otherwise than an ever increasing certainty of our knowledge that Jesus is the Son of God.

Nothing can equal the confidence that comes into one's life with the knowledge of a firm foundation of our faith. Such a strong and abiding foundation comes with the continued study of the word of God.

The consequence of such a study of Jesus will be a new delight in his service, and an increasing understanding of the ways and means of service. This is a confident confession of Christ also, a life calmly and quietly, patiently and steadfastly performing his works, living a life inspired by him and directed by his ideals,—this is the best and most convincing confession. It is the unanswerable confession not only of conviction but of sincerity. And the result will be "men will see your good works and glorify your Father in heaven."

Such a course is a convincing confession, for "by your fruits" men "shall know" you.

The public confession of our faith at the entrance into the Christian life is required by scripture and by example. It is a grand occasion. It is a real testing of the one who makes it.

The public obedience in baptism is also a confident confession of our faith. Otherwise there would be no reason for such an action. The reception into the membership of the church is another confession of Christ. The first time we commune with him at his table is a moment hardly forgotten; it too is a confession of Christ.

The regular attendance upon the public services of the Lord's house is a good confession of Christ. Many occasions invite us to neglect it, many of our fellows neglect it. Our fidelity is a good confession of our love for Christ and faith in him.

The first self-denial for his sake is a good confession of our faith, for without faith in Christ self-denial would be impossible.

The time you went to the one with whom you quarrelled and "made it up," though it was a humiliation to you, was a good confession of your faith in Christ.

When you go to the Wednesday night prayer-meeting, as your pledge requires you to do, you make a confident and convincing confession of your faith. It is a sweet thing on consecration night in Endeavor meeting to "stand up for Christ" and to "say a word for Jesus." But "actions speak louder than words." Remember the old saying, "What you are speaks so loud that I can not hear what you say."

There are many other ways of denying Christ than by keeping silent in testimony meeting. Suppose Christ denies us before the face of the Father? May it not be so.

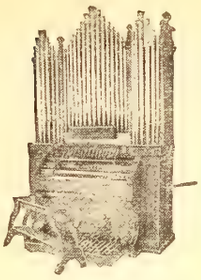
Midweek Prayer-Meeting

By Charles Blanchard.

The Best Way Sometimes the Longest.



Topic, December 11.—Exodus 13:17-22.

This story of the wandering of the children of Israel in the wilderness, as the apostle tells us, was written for our learning. And we may well profit by the things that fell out to them by the way. It is a wonderful story, full of fascination and instruction for such as have the heart to understand. It is a human history, with a touch of the romantic, the miraculous, but withal so human that it appeals to hearts everywhere. Over and over we read the record, pathetic and at times provoking, yet always with a sense of the human element running through it all. Even Moses, the man of God, was a very human sort of man, with many of the weaknesses that belong to men in the midst of the struggles of life. The value of the narrative lies in this very thing. He was a man among men. The Israelites were neither worse nor better than ordinary folks. Taking into account the age in which they lived, they were not worse than we should expect. Considering their environments, their centuries of slavery, their history reads like a chapter in the romance of the world's redemption, as indeed it is.

Their forty years' wandering in the wilderness, while doubtless owing to their own cowardly and vacillating manner, was probably in harmony with the divine purpose in the evolution of the nation and the redemption of the race through the Hebrew people. And I find myself not only recognizing the fact but also rejoicing in it. There is encouragement in the final outcome of the long and troubled journey, notwithstanding the fact that a multitude of them fell by the way. It was God's way of teaching them and us. Discipline is the divine way. Patience is the prevailing thing in all our lives.

It was the Lord that led them all the way from Egypt to Kadesh-Barnea, near the entrance to the promised land. Here the spies were sent out, with the Lord's approval, who returned with the report of the conditions of the country and the character of the people who dwelt there. That the report of the ten was exaggerated there is no doubt. That they were well able to go up and possess the land, had they all been of the spirit and courage of Joshua and Caleb, there can be no doubt. It was a part of the divine kindness and patience that they were permitted to turn back from the immediate conquest of Canaan. The fact is they were not ready yet for the conflict and for the conquest. Even had they gone on and succeeded in overcoming the different tribes they were not ready for national life. The long period under Joshua and the judges reveals this clearly. The purpose of Jehovah is manifest in the wilderness journey. It was while they thus journeyed that the law was given at Sinai, the worship of the tabernacle instituted, and the people inured to hardships. To learn to endure hardness is a part of the discipline of every life. This is one of the lessons of the wilderness way, which every one must walk at some period in life.

And let us not forget that it was the Lord that led them all the way, with the pillar of cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night. This was the symbol of the divine presence and power. There is nothing in all the history of Israel more suggestive than the presence of the cloud and fire, symbols of the divine guidance and grace. Therein is the assurance of the promise that God would be with them and fight for them. It is the sweet old promise, repeated with loving favor many times during the history of his chosen people. And we find the same repeated with tender assurance by the Lord just before he went away. Not in the pillar of cloud and fire, but in the abiding presence and power of the Holy Spirit have we the fulfillment of the Master's last promise of love to all his own. Does the way seem long and ofttimes dreary? Remember the Master is leading. It is his way and his will. It is ours to follow. It was best for Israel. It is best for us.

The Bible School at Work

Conducted by J. H. HARDIN,

State Bible School Superintendent of Missouri, 311 Century Bldg, Kansas City, Mo.

The Interdenominational Convention of Missouri.

The forty-second annual convention of the Missouri Sunday-school Association was held in the St. Paul Methodist Episcopal Church South, Springfield, Mo., November 19-21. Three hundred and fifty people registered in attendance. Reports of the past year's operations were for the most part encouraging, with many things to require careful thought to insure large success. The association has suffered in various ways for a few years past, but now bids fair to regain the ground for some reason lost. Secretary Elmer E. Lacey has striven earnestly the past year to win success for the association and this splendid convention was the result and reward of his efforts. L. L. Allen, president and chairman of the executive committee, has shown himself a true leader and organizer, and the convention showed its appreciation of his leadership by re-electing him. Mr. Allen was prevented by business and domestic affairs from being present after the first day of the convention. I was chosen to preside in his stead.

The program of the convention was one of the very best. Nearly all of those assigned to duties were present, and the program ran on schedule time from the beginning to the close. The addresses, lectures, conferences, etc., were of a very practical, and therefore a profitable kind. There was but little theorizing, but instead there was much instruction in practical ways of doing the work in school and general field. There was a notable absence from the program of the hackneyed subjects which convention ears have been so frequently called upon to endure. A new era has come to Sunday-school work, and the sun of the new day has arisen even upon Sunday-school conventions.

The presence of Marion Lawrance, secretary of the International Association, was a great help to the convention. Mr. Lawrance is a leader in the true sense and in this way was able to do much in forwarding the Missouri work. But he is not only a leader in the way of organization; he is also a platform man of distinguished brilliancy and power. His addresses drew and held large audiences, and those who heard them went away feeling that they had received something worth their time and money used in attending.

The union spirit was strong in the convention. The sentiment expressed by one speaker that we were there not to represent denominations, but simply as Christians without reference to denominational affiliations was applauded to the echo, as was every allusion to the subject of co-operation and union in Christian work. The small-minded sectarian seeking for denominational distinction or advantage, was, if present, in a very uncongenial atmosphere. The ministers of our three churches in Springfield, Brethren Moffitt, Ragland and Walters, were present most of the time, and with them good delegations from their churches. Our people can not be rallied to this gathering in proportionately as large numbers as those of some other bodies in Missouri, for the reason that they attend our own convention in large numbers, and can not be induced to attend this one in addition. Others have only this Sunday-school convention, and hence make it the Sunday-school event of the year. However, our representation was larger than last year, and with proper attention to the matter it will increase from year to year. The presence of such leading ministers as W. F. Turner, of Joplin, and W. W. Burks, of Nevada, was an inspiration and source of strength.

The citizens of Springfield opened their homes to the delegates with their accustomed hospitality. The pastor of the St. Paul church, Dr. Briggs, and his congregation, placed themselves at the service of the convention with a complete surrender to its convenience and enjoyment.

Drury College, through its genial and brainy president, Dr. J. H. George, and its faculty, was felt as a leading factor in the convention's work, and its platform was open to convention speakers allowing the convention plans and spirit to be brought to the attention of its splendid student body.

Like most conventions the best things defy one to put a report of them on paper.

Honest Even With a Railroad.

"Yes," said a railway claim agent in New Orleans, "we come across queer things sometimes. The queerest thing in my experience was the case of a minister. This man was hurt in a rear-end collision and we gave him $5,000 damages. At the end of the year we got a letter from him that ran something like this: 'My salary is $2,000, and the accident caused me to lose it for a twelvemonth. My medical expenses were $750. My board at a mountain sanatorium for six months was $850. Other expenses due to this accident were, in round numbers, $1,000; total, $4,600. You gave me $5000. Now I am back in the pulpit again, as well and strong as ever, and I have $400 of your money on hands. Not being entitled to that sum, I do what any other minister would do in my place—I return the money to you as per check enclosed.' How was that for honesty?" said the claim agent. "The ministers are a wonderful lot. We sent the $400 back to this honest minister and he gave it to charity in our name."—Kansas City Star.

Little Bobby was saying his prayers at his mother's knees, but so rapidly that she asked him why he did not speak more slowly. "Because, you know," he replied, "it would keep all the other children waiting!"

Japanese Proverbs.

This, from the Japanese, is worth reading and remembering:

"He who knows not, and knows not that he knows not, is a fool. Shun him.

"He who knows not, and knows that he knows not, is humble. Teach him.

"He who knows, and knows not that he knows, is asleep. Wake him.

"He who knows, and knows that he knows, is a wise man. Follow him."

Where the Turkeys Come From.

It is estimated that over 5,000,000 are consumed by the American people during the Thanksgiving season. It will be readily seen what an important industry turkey-raising is. The work of gathering the supply and getting it to the markets of great cities is no small task.

Some of the enterprising commission houses, that supply the best hotels and homes where money does not have to be counted carefully, send men up into the rural communities in search of the finest birds. The farmer generally knows when he has a particularly fine specimen, as well as the shrewd buyer does, and it is nip and tuck between them to fix on a price.

Cheerfulness at Table.

An old lady who looked as though she might have belonged to the "Sunshine Society" all her life, says a writer in Table Talk, was asked by a friend for the secret of her never-failing cheerfulness. Her answer contains a suggestive lesson for parents. "I think," said the clever old lady, "it is because we were taught in our family to be cheerful at table. My father was a lawyer with a large criminal practice; his mind was harassed with difficult problems all the day long; yet he always came to the table with a smile and a pleasant greeting for everyone, and exerted himself to make the table hour delightful. All his powers to charm were freely given to entertain his family. Three times a day we felt this genial influence, and the effect was marvelous. If a child came to the table with cross looks he or she was quietly sent away to find a good boy or girl, for only such were allowed to come within that loving circle. We were taught that all petty grievances and jealousies must be forgotten when mealtime came, and the habit of being cheerful three times a day, under all circumstances, had its effect on even the most sullen temper.

Much is said and written these days about "table manners." Children (in well-bred families) are drilled in a knowledge of "good form" as to the use of the fork and napkin; proper methods of eating the various courses are descanted upon, but training in the most important grace or habit a child must have, that of cheerfulness at table, is too often neglected.

The Orientals had no family ties of affection until they began to eat at a common table. Let the gathering at mealtime be made the most happy hour of the day, and the influence on the children may be beyond estimation.

The Work of Springtime.

If we are reminded at Thanksgiving time of nature's bounties, it is with the reflection that, while the sheaves are garnered in September, they are sown in March and April. The autumn does not make a shock. It is simply the place where many weeks and months have met to lay up their golden store.

OLD LETTERS

(A STORY)

By ALEXANDRA WATSON.

Elizabeth was thirty, and although a goodly number of letters, received that morning, were lying on her table inviting her interest in the actualities of life, she felt in a mood for retrospect.

It was a chilly evening in May, and though fires had been virtually considered unseasonable for a month past, Elizabeth was an adept at finding good reasons for lighting one. To-night it was her birthday, and she was alone in a foreign land; surely the most economical mind could not cavil at her desire for the cheerful companionship of a friendly blaze. So she took a handful of sticks and some split logs from the old wooden box in the corner, and soon the wood was crackling merrily in the queer little portable fireplace, with its black funnel rising through the mantlepiece to finally disappear into the wall. Elizabeth always said that she had taken her rooms three years before on account of the fireplace. They had looked dreary enough on the dull day when she had come to visit them, the former lodger having removed everything that could have given them a look of comfort or finish. Only a few picture-hooks adorntd the vasty expanse of wall, while in the sitting-room the only important pieces of furniture—an enormous red sofa, apparently upholstered with bullets, an oval mahogany table with a satin cloth of a different red from the sofa, and a capacious plush-covered armchair of still another shade in red—were all huddled together near one of the walls. But there was an open fireplace—that expensive rara avis in a small Swiss flat where shut-up stoves are the rule—and Elizabeth, having a rapid mental vision of the firelight sparkling across the polished floor, had taken the rooms without hesitation. They had been slowly metamorphosed since that distant day. Elizabeth's books, pictures, and artistic trifles had soon taken away the empty look, and by degrees drastic reforms had been undertaken. The red and white art-muslin curtains at the two sitting-room windows had been removed for washing and starching, and then put up again by Elizabeth herself, for the landlady had had no sympathy with the movement, declaring that the curtains could not possibly be dirty, as they had been new when hung, and had been up only three years! The red satin tablecloth had been reverently returned to its owner as too good for every-day use, and remade by Italian peasant-women and stamped with a quaint sixteenth century design. That had been a present from an Italian pupil and friend of Elizabeth's. Several other artistic objects in the room were presents also, and Elizabeth looked at them affectionately as she thought of the different kind donors who had passed through her lonely existence to enrich it with a souvenir.

With the fire lit on that chill May evening, that sitting-room with its air of comfortable shabbiness and artistic Bohemianism was wonderfully attractive. It had a more than usually festive air that day, due to the splendid birthday bouquet, direct from the Riviera, in a fat green jug on the oval table. Elizabeth always had flowers of some kind, and to-day there were also narcissi and forget-me-nots on the writing-table, gathered from the neighboring fields, and yellow marguerites on the long, low bookshelf, beside the marble head of a young Virgin, attributed to Donatello. Elizabeth's gaze wandered round the room appreciatively, resting at length on her bicycle in a corner, trying to hide its front wheel behind one side of the gigantic sofa. Elizabeth loved her bicycle too well to relegate it to the darkness of the cellar. It was an Englishman, and she called it "Bob," after a companion in many excursions that she had known well years before; thus in her long, solitary rides she never felt quite alone.

Perhaps it was looking at the bicycle which brought on the retrospective mood; it carried her mind back to other scenes than those of that quiet Swiss town. She did not feel old that evening because she was thirty, but because the restless storm of life had tossed her to and fro through many different experiences. She realized suddenly how far she had come, how much she had left behind. Now she seemed to be resting on her oars awhile; nothing much had happened since she took those rooms three years before. She had had summer holidays in England, excursions into France and Italy, but these did not count. Fate had had nothing to do with them. It had been busy elsewhere while she surreptitiously purchased them out of her fairly ample earnings. Yes, but Fate had indeed been busy elsewhere; her brother had been married and had a son; her sister was engaged. These two beings, who represented all she had in the way of family ties, except half-uncles and distant cousins, seemed to have been caught away from her. Just that day, her sister's letter, describing the house she and "Ralph" had taken, and were busy furnishing, had given her a greater sense of distance than any Continental time-table could have done. This "Ralph" was an upstart—Elizabeth had only met him twice—and this house was so far and so different from any of the houses she had known. What did her little sister mean by wanting to go and live in a strange house with a strange man? If only her mother had lived, perhaps the past would not to-day be seeming so utterly, irretrievably past. Then Elizabeth smiled with a determined cheerfulness. She would not let sad thoughts assail her to-night; it was bad enough to be getting old without that. Her mother was not really dead, after all. Nobody was dead. Her bookshelves teemed with the life of so-called dead men, and she had letters from her mother, memories of her, and inherited characteristics which would keep alive that exuberant personality as long as she, Elizabeth, was on the planet. Then, thinking of letters, Elizabeth's mind reverted to the case of them in the other room. She hardly ever read old letters, though she sometimes wished that the house would be burnt down and rid her of them, relieving her thus of the painful responsibility of destroying them herself. There were so many she knew that were not worth keeping, but they reminded her of something, some quite or nearly forgotten episode of her changeful life. She would look into them this evening, she said resolutely, and weed out those which were really futile. She had nothing special to do, and the hours showed an unusual tendency to drag; besides, it would be a good way of marking the arrival of that important milestone—thirty.

So she went into her bedroom and dragged out from its corner the wooden case in which her books had traveled across the Continent, and which was now full of letters and other "rubbish," as she disrespectfully designated various rough drafts of literary efforts. She filled her arms with tied-up bundles of correspondence, and then betook herself to the red armchair, before the now brightly glowing pine logs. Elizabeth was not an extremely orderly person, but there was a kind of irregular order in her mode of classing her old letters. They were not classed according to their writers or their dates—that would have been too much trouble—but according to the addresses on the envelopes. There was a bundle bearing the address of each house in which Elizabeth had lived for a longer or shorter time—generally for a shorter, so that the bundles were numerous. There was a bundle received at the English boarding-school where she had gone on leaving home for the first time, never again to return permanently; a bundle addressed to an out-of-the-way school in Switzerland, where she had run as wild and learnt as little French as possible; another, containing letters addressed c|o two Swiss families where she had successively spent some months "on mutual terms," the first of depressing, the second of uplifting memory, for had she not fallen pleasantly and painlessly in love there for the first time! Then there was a bundle addressed c|o a family in Germany; there, at least had been no danger of sentiment, had sentiment been much in Elizabeth's line. Afterwards came a fat parcel bearing the name of an aristocratic street in London, where she had been governess for two weary years; and after that, and ever after, addresses of numerous lodgings in the great northern city, where she had lived the life of a "bachelor girl," working early and late, year in and year out, in busy mercantile of ses until her untiring Fate had swept her again across the Continent into those two unpretentious rooms. Well, it was a chequered enough record of fourteen years of life, that those dusty bundles revealed. No wonder she felt old!

Elizabeth hesitated as to which bundle to open first, knowing that the one she decided on would probably last her for the rest of the evening. Finally she slowly took up the packet addressed to her first lodgings, her mind harking back, as she undid the string, to the day when, with trembling excitement, she had received the offer of a post as foreign correspondent. All the joys of liberty had seemed to be hers at that moment. She recalled with a wistful little smile her rapture at the idea of living in rooms. It had taken a good many musty-fusty experiences to completely dispel that rapture, and even now, as she looked round her cheerful nest, the worst fault she could find with bachelor life was its loneliness. But there had been no thoughts of loneliness in those first days, for had she not had Bob, who, though his friendship had soon fizzled out when he left her, had been a good comrade then in his selfish, superior way. She had wept some of her rare, salt tears over his defection and perhaps it was because of a lingering tenderness for the boy-man whose willing slave she had made herself in those old days, that she was moved now to open the bundle in which she knew there were some letters which he had written her while away on his holidays. They could not be called love-letters by any stretch of the imagination. Elizabeth had nothing of the kind in her collection, for she had never had a lover, though her mother had always striven to make out that it was only because she had never encouraged anybody. Elizabeth had let that pass, reserving to herself the belief that no one had been very anxious to be encouraged, and the certainty that there had never been anybody that she had in the least wanted to encourage. Bob, of course, had been different. Their friendship had been of the real platonic brand, for in those days marriage had been far enough away from the thoughts of either of them, and married folks only subjects for pity and a little mischievous disdain. Elizabeth wondered sometimes whether he had ever married; it was so very long since she had heard from him—nothing since he had left for South Africa six years before. She carefully picked out of the opened bundle his first letter, written from a little country place where he had gone to fish and boat. It was short enough:—

"Dear Old Scarcrow,—Please go to my digs and ask for my other braces, and send them on. I've broken these, and as you aren't here to mend anything, I'm quite lost. This is a ripping little place; I can imagine how you would revel in it. One can dress in anything or nothing. I wish you were here to bait my hooks—for other things too, of course. So long.—Yours, Bob."

Elizabeth chuckled delightedly. How like his imperious way it was; but at least he had thought of her, and how she would have revelled in the freedom of that rustic life. After all, nobody had ever known or understood her so well as Bob had done.

Another letter was from London:—

"Dear Betty,—London is horribly overrated. There isn't a restaurant where you can get a decent dinner under 5s. I'm absolutely stoney, but don't want to come home until I've seen 'The Man from Blankley's,' which I am told is stunning. I suppose you couldn't lend me half-a-sov.? Only if it is quite convenient, of course. I know you aren't exactly rolling in wealth. I think of you in the evenings when I go for a prowl round the back streets. That would just suit your Bohemian tastes, and under my manly protection, your character would be safe. Good-bye till Thursday evening. I shall arrive at six, and come round to you for supper. Jog Mrs. P. up, and try to have something tasty for once. —Your rock-bound Bob."

"He only wrote when he wanted something, the wretch," reflected Elizabeth indulgently; "but I encouraged him to make a doormat of me, and he certainly did like me a bit for myself."

There were one or two other short notes of a similar character, then a long epistle about a row he had had with his father, which finished up with:—

"I'm doing really no good in England; everything is too potty here. I am sure I could make my way in the colonies, if Dad would only rig me out and give me a start. I would leave to-morrow if I could without a regret, and nobody would miss me but you. I would miss you too horribly, of course, but would find you a good billet wherever I happened to settle, and then, if you came out, we'd have royal times together."

Elizabeth sighed a little. How that letter brought out the careless good nature of Bob's happy-go-lucky temperament. Far from finding her a "good billet," he had not even written her a line since he went, and any "royal times" he had had, had not needed her participation.

There were various communications which had been left at her lodgings. A much twisted-up billet ran:—

"Pity and forgive me! All our little plans for this evening and to-morrow are off. Aunt Jane has arrived, and I must trot her out somewhere this evening, and go with her to church and lunch to-morrow. Think of me sipping the quintessence of boredom!

"Have your spin all the same. I thought you looking a bit peekish yesterday; some fresh air will do you good, and you can find out what sort of roads there are in that district against our next sortie."

The last letter of any length had been received when Elizabeth was at home for a week, during the first part of her mother's illness:—

"Dear Jonathan,—I'm awfully cut up to hear that your mother is so bad. Your letter made me feel quite blue, for it's so unlike you to be down in the mouth. In fact I'm struck this week by how very lively you must be, for things feel amazingly slow without you. I tried to drown my sorrow at your absence last Saturday by spending the evening with Will Short. We went to a third-rate sort of theatre, of which you would have disapproved, and which was certainly silly enough, if not worse. Afterwards we had supper, and drank a bit, I not much, on my honour, but Will somewhat 'copiously.' You will be pleased to hear that I didn't enjoy myself thinking that Will had developed into a bounder. Perhaps he always was one, but I didn't notice it much before you and I got chummy. You know, old girl, that you have quite played the 'guardian angel' business where I am concerned, and that I might easily have gone to the dogs if I hadn't met you. That was another thing that struck me during that rotten play, so the evening wasn't lost. You will say this is all nonsense, and in any case you needn't be unduly puffed up, for I never heard of an angel who had a temper, or who could say such 'narsty' things, when she liked. All the same, men wouldn't fight so shy of angels, if they were all such downright good fellows as you are. Hurry up and come back.—Your David."

Elizabeth remembered having been touched by this, the first sign of a more serious vein that she had detected in Bob's sunny temperament. She remembered also having indignantly pooh-poohed the idea of the "guardian angel business." Bob was naturally a straight, clean-minded boy, she had told herself. Now, however, after a good lapse of years, and with a considerably wider knowledge of life, even her unspoilt modesty admitted that she might have been an unconscious influence for good, in keeping Bob, for a time at least,

A Great Physiologist

Once Said the Way to Keep the Stomach Healthy Is To Exercise It.

But He Did Not Tell How to Make It Healthy.

The muscles of the body can be developed by exercise until their strength has increased manifold, and a proper amount of training each day will accomplish this result, but it is somewhat doubtful whether you can increase the digestive powers of the stomach by eating indigestible food in order to force it to work.

Nature has furnished us all with a perfect set of organs, and if they are not abused they will attend to the business required of them. They need no abnormal strength.

There is a limit to the weight a man can lift, and there is also a limit to what the stomach can do.

The cause of dyspepsia, indigestion and many affiliated diseases is that the stomach has been exercised too much and it is tired and worn out. Not exercise but rest is what it needs.

To take something into the stomach that will relieve it from its work for a short time—something to digest the food will give it a rest and allow it time to regain its strength.

The proper aid to the digestive organs is Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, which cure dyspepsia, indigestion, gas on the stomach and bowels, heartburn, palpitation of the heart and all stomach diseases.

Rest and invigoration is what the stomach gets when you use Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, for one grain of the active principle in them is sufficient to digest 3,000 grains of food.

The Tablets increase the flow of gastric juice, and prevent fermentation, acidity and sour eructions.

Do not attempt to starve out dyspepsia. You need all your strength.

The common sense method is to digest the food for the stomach and give it a rest.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets do not make the cure, but enable the organs to throw off unhealthy conditions.

Perfect digestion means perfect health, for under these conditions only do the different organs of the body work right and receive the building-up material found in pure blood.

Stuart's Dyspesia Tablets is a natural remedy and is a specific for stomach troubles. The ablest physicians prescribe them.

The Tablets are pleasant to the taste, and are composed of fruit and vegetable extracts, golden seal and pepsin.

out of the pitfalls into which ennui and homelessness often lead the feet of even clean-minded boys. She realized also that her power had lain in her unconsciousness of it; Bob's "superiority" would never have put up with preaching.

Elizabeth seemed to have forgotten all about her plan of sorting out her letters. With Bob's little collection in her lap, she sat gazing musingly into the fire. She was reviewing the different events in as frank a comradeship as had ever existed between a man and woman, or rather, boy and girl, as Bob and she had been then, in heart and thought, at least, if not in years.

She remembered how sudden the separation had been at the last; how Bob had come to her very late one evening to tell her that he had found "a chap" who would pay his expenses to South Africa, and give him some work on his up-country farm; that he had given notice at his office, and was leaving in a week with his future employer. She remembered how she had fought back her own chill dread at the idea of parting, so as not to damp Bob's enthusiasm; how she had worked through nearly every night during that week to alter and arrange things which he had bought pell-mell for his outfit; how, when the last evening had come, she had seemed so merry that Bob had suddenly exclaimed, "You don't seem a bit sorry that I am going," upon which she had had to bite her lips hard not to burst out crying. They had only shaken hands very cordially at the last, without any apparent emotion. Bob had said, "Mind you keep smiling; I'll write." He never had—and that was all.

The outside bell rang sharply. Elizabeth started, and looked at the clock. It was a quarter to ten. It could be nobody for her at that hour. She bundled all the letters on to the sofa, however, and got up to listen. Somebody with a deep-toned masculine voice was talking to her old landlady, and she distinctly heard her name. She threw open her door, and a tall, lean, brown-faced man stepped into the light.

"Bob!" exclaimed Elizabeth, breathlessly.

"My dear old Betty!" He had taken both her hands, and was shaking them violently.

"Where have you come from, and what are you doing here?" Elizabeth managed to ask when the door was shut.

"Come straight from the station, to wish you many happy returns of the day. Say you're glad to see me!"

"Why, surely that goes without saying." Elizabeth was recovering her equanimity. "Sit down, and tell me how on earth you managed to find me out here."

"Not without difficulty, I assure you. After spending a few days at home, and eating as much of the fatted calf as I could digest, I set out on my journey of discovery. I knew your mother's house in Westmoreland had been given up, so I went to Burrows and Burrows, who could give me no satisfaction. I then made the round of all your lodgings, one landlady sending me on to another, but also without success. All I could learn was that you had left suddenly when your mother died, and written to have your things sent on. I got desperate then, and thought of advertising in the Agony Column; was just saved from doing so by catching sight of your brother's name on a poster. I did not know that he had begun business for himself, but could not mistake the name, which is uncommon. I careered therefore across England again, and interviewed your worthy relation, who gave me your address in a commiserating sort of a way, as if he weren't quite sure of my reception. That was yesterday morning, and here I am."

"You would have saved yourself a lot of time and trouble if you had sent me a card with your address some years ago," said Elizabeth drily.

"I knew you would say that, and I was to blame, though perhaps not quite in the way you think. Give me a chance to explain things a bit before you pitch into me. Hallo! What's this?" Bob had stooped and picked up one of his old letters, fallen from the sofa.

"You see what it is," said Elizabeth cooly. "By a curious coincidence, while sorting through some old letters, preparatory to burning them, I came across those of yours. It's the strangest thing that I should have unearthed them to-night, for I have not thought of them or you in any direct manner for many years now."

"There's a true Elizabeth speech." said Bob, biting his moustache vexedly. "You haven't changed much, I see, except that you're a bit better looking, and a great deal more stylish. Well, what did you deduce from my old letters?"

"That you used to be a selfish, uppish young jackanapes," replied Elizabeth, laughing in spite of herself at Bob's downcast countenance; "and see that you haven't changed in the particular of disliking to have your important self neglected, even if only in the shape of a hallowed memory."

"Oh, it's not that," said Bob, gloomily. "I've had all my conceit knocked out of me long ago. Only I'm afraid I've made a mistake in coming."

"Nonsense!" said Elizabeth; "you musn't mind my chaff. I'm delighted to see you, and with a little jogging, my memory will perhaps bring you into focus again. Only give it time, and in the meanwhile, let me have some account of your doings and wanderings."

"Oh, wait a bit; let's talk about yourself," returned Bob, looking somewhat reassured. "What a jolly room! Better than any of the old lot. You're a real homemaker, Betty; not of the fidgety, house-proud order, but of the kind that makes one feel at rest and secure. I believe you'd create that impression in a tent in the middle of a prairie. Why, you've got a new bike!" As he got up to examine it, Elizabeth's gaze followed him. There was still something of the winning boy about him, but all the rest had changed. There was strength and self-reliance in the broadened shoulders and firm chin, but all the cocksureness had disappeared out of his manner, and there was a still subtler change in the expression of the eyes. It was the expression of one who had faced the great realities of life, and for whom henceforth, its littlenesses did not count. Elizabeth began to be ashamed of her somewhat cool reception.

"Yes," she said, joining him near the bicycle; "it's the best chum I've had since you left, and its name is Bob, too."

Bob's brown cheek flushed. "Then it's not true that you had forgotten me," he said, looking at her scrutinizingly. "You gave me such a horrid fright, Betty."

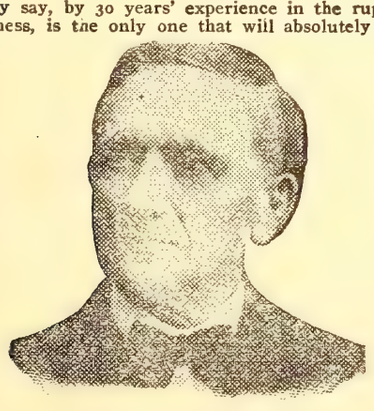
"There you go again, as conceited as ever," laughed Elizabeth, flinching a little under his intent gaze. "Are you the only Bob in the world?"

"I would like to be so for you, Betty." he said, suddenly and earnestly putting his hands on her shoulders and trying to read her eyes. "I've come all the way from South Africa to tell you so. Say it's not a fool's errand."

"Oh! don't let's talk about such things," said Elizabeth flurriedly, breaking away from him. "Your methods are so frightfully abrupt. Please remember that there was never anything of that sort between us, and that you haven't given me a sign of life for nearly six years."

"You think you have a lot to forgive," said Bob, re-seating himself reluctantly. "You're right enough, but when I've told you about things, I shall count on your generosity, which never failed me in the old days, however little I deserved it. I won't attempt to give you anything but the merest outline now; we shall have time, I hope, to fill in the gaps later. Eh, old girl?" He leaned towards the red armchair and tried to take her hand.

"Oh! do get on with your story," said Elizabeth fretfully, moving her chair nervously away from him.



"Well, as I have no right to expect payment on credit," said Bob wistfully, "it's perhaps the best thing to do. I never did forget you, Betty, though it's only for the last two years that I've thought about you in the way I do now, and always shall in the future. The reason why I didn't write, as I said I would, was just that vanity and conceit of which you accused me just now, and which certainly were among my former attributes. I had gone away with such a flourish of trumpets that I couldn't bear to own that I'd been made a fool of. I hadn't travelled many days in the company of my new patron before I began to guess that he was a 'wrong un,' and greenhorn as I still was, to suspect that I'd been engaged to act as tool for some dirty work. I kept my suspicions to myself, however, until we had landed, waiting to be sure of my ground. He soon gave himself away, and though I tried to be diplomatic, he understood that he had got hold of the wrong man for his business, and tried to run a knife through me. I was too quick for him, though I did not get away without that."

Bob opened his broad palm, and showed a prodigious white scar which zig-zagged across it. Elizabeth shuddered.

"Well, you are not surprised that I did not hasten to send you an account of that cheerful little beginning? After that, I did a bit of everything—helped in a store in Cape Town, ran an up-country post-office, worked as a farm laborer, broke in horses, tramped, starved, almost died. It was about then that I met Bill, and if it hadn't been for him, I shouldn't be here now. He is not educated, and rough enough, but sound and sweet as a nut. I had a terrible attack of fever, and in my lucid moments, was sure I was dying. Then a veil seemed to be lifted from my eyes, and I knew myself for the fool I had been, the selfish, self-satisfied fool. I began also to think about you differently. I had missed you more than I can say, and thought about you constantly all along, especially the nights when I slept under the stars, for I remembered your saying once that Life could never lack beauty and dignity in a climate where one could be always, night and day, in the open air, and it seemed as if everything would be easy again, if you were only there within call. If I didn't write, it was only because I hadn't the courage to tell you how down on my luck I was, what a miserable failure I had made of things. I knew it was cowardly of me, but I didn't realize then that I was behaving like a cur to you, after what we had been to each other. But during that fever I began to understand something of the woman's heart in you, which had hidden itself behind the frank girl I had known; knew suddenly all you had been and done for me, and what a poor return I had made for it; knew that my silence had been nothing less than a crime against you; knew that I loved you, had always loved you, had been nothing and done nothing since I had left you. God! the agony of mind that that knowledge brought me! I was tortured with the kind of remorse that a man must feel, when havig found a priceless pearl, he lets it carelessly slip through his fingers. It was a great longing to pay back in love and care some of my debts to you that kept me from dying, I believe. Anyway, I came slowly back to life, with Bill's help, with a new sort of belief in myself which I felt was going to help me to succeed in something, for it is only when a man begins to work for somebody that he loves better than himself that he is able to bring out the best that is in him. As soon as I was well enough, Bill and I set out together for an unworked diamond mine, for which he had got the rights from a fugitive he had helped out of the country. But before that, I wrote and told you everything, feeling somehow sure that if my letter found you, it would find you just the same, ready to understand and forgive, ready perhaps to give to the new Bob some of the tenderness I guessed then you'd had for the old one. But my letter was returned to me from 'your mother's old house, marked 'Gone, no address,' and I had no better luck when I wrote to Burrows and Burrows, who never replied. So there was nothing to do but work, for I had no money to go home and look for you, and nothing to offer you when I got there. But this time I worked with the energy of three men. Bill and I set about exploiting the diamond mine ourselves, and after a year of hard labour, knew we were to be rich men. We got the coolies started working, and organized everything properly; then I came away. I have left Bill to supervise things, but promised him to be back in three months. So I must start in a week."

"Oh, not so soon!" cried Elizabeth, whose eyes had moistened, then glowed, during the course of Bob's simple but graphic tale.

"But you will come with me?" There was a whole world of anxious pleading in Bob's voice.

"I couldn't possibly be ready," said Elizabeth, unguardedly.

"Oh, if that's all," cried Bob, with a sudden extraordinary light in his eyes; "you remember how long it took me to get ready, and there was no money about then." He was leaning over Elizabeth's chair now, his hair almost touching hers.

"No, no, that isn't all," said Elizabeth, starting up, and pushing him gently from her. "There are all sorts of other things. You must go away now, Bob. I am tired and overwrought, and may let you believe things that I shall be sorry for to-morrow. Besides, it's after eleven, and this landlady is not used to late hours or gentlemen visitors. I shall entirely lose my character." Elizabeth tried to smile to hide the trembling of her lips.

"Hang your landlady and your character! I will look after that. I shall not go until I have got something that I have been wanting for a very long time." Bob's voice had become obstinate and masterful.

"What's that?" asked Elizabeth doubtfully.

"When I thought I was dying, Betty, the greatest regret I had was that I had not kissed you that evening before I left. Though you were so proud, I did not think you would have minded then. It seemed to me that I was dying without having tasted of any of life's sweetest things, and the thought was a very bitter one. It is two years since then, but that regret, instead of diminishing, has sharpened into a still keener longing, and to-night, for my welcome home, I will not be cheated out of what I was fool enough to let slip at our parting."

Elizabeth's feeble resistance was no match for the strength of Bob's long pent-up tenderness. He drew her to him, and kissed her on the hair, the eyes, the mouth.

"Don't be so silly, Bob dear," she murmured. "Don't you know I am thirty?"

But the all-conquering Bob of the old days had won her again, and she knew it.

Teddy's Soliloquy.

Grown folks are so queer, it seems to me;
They almost make me vexed;
They think I ought to be one day
What I can't be the next.

One day my sister Kate and I Went out of doors to play
Beside a little muddy pool;
She got right in my way.

I didn't think, but threw a stone
And spattered Kate's new frock;
She jumped, and home she crying went,
To tell about the shock.

Then mother said: "Why, Teddy Jones!
A big, smart boy like you!"
And grandma said: "You've grown so big
I thought you better knew."

My father said: "Boys will be boys;"
But Aunt Mary hushed him quick.
"Ted Jones," she said, "is much too big
To play that shabby trick."

And Aunt Maud pitied "poor, dear Kate";
At me sharp looks she threw.
"You ought to act the man," she said,
"A boy as big as you!"

Next day I asked to do some things
That big folks will enjoy.
"Oh, no!" they said, "you're much too small,
You're just a little boy."

Of course, I know grown folks are right;
But truly I'm perplexed
At finding that I'm big one day
And very small the next.

A Forgiving Party.

"All them 'at's mad at me an' ready to furgive come to the appel tree at 5.
"Allan."

It was chalked on a board in big letters, so that Philip could easily spell it out. And Philip was mad at Allan, because Allan had hit his dog with a stone, so that the dog was limping all day. To be sure, Allan said that he had not seen the dog, but then Allan was always doing things and saying things he didn't mean to.

Nancy Oaks came along just then, and read it carefully. "I ain't a-goin'," she burst out. "He broke my Ruby Pearl so 'at she'll never go to sleep again. He run over her with his express wagon, he did! I won't go to his old party."

Patsy heard her, and laughed. "Well, you'll see me there," he said. "An' I'll squirt with his hose all I want to. You see if I don't!"

Meanwhile, Allan had various troubles of his own. All this had come about by his learning the text, "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath." His mother explained it to him. "There's a whole lot that's mad at me," he said, sorrowfully, to his mother.

"See if you can not find a way to make up with them," his mother replied. And Allan had gone to the barn to look at the colts, when the idea of a makeup party came to him. "If mother'd let me have some cookies an' popcorn, I

So the next thing was to ask mamma and she said there were plenty of cookies for a party, and Jane should set the table for him under the apple tree. But now, when it was three in the afternoon, Allan's heart misgave him. He was afraid nobody would come. "About all I play with are mad, and it'd be lonesome if nobody came," he thought.

Jane set the table under the apple tree. There were cookies and honey and ginger bread, and popcorn, and pink lemonade, but Allan could not feel as if this was a picnic; it was a very subdued little boy who awaited Patsy as he came forward with a cheery "Hello there!" He was followed by the twins, Bee and Boo, who lived in the large house around the other side of the hill. They were mad because Alan wouldn't let them ride in his automobile. But the automobile was on hand now, and they raced down the hill, after one longing look at the honey quivering in the sunlight. And so one after another they all came, even Nancy Oaks, made up, until there wasn't one who had not forgiven him when the sun went down.—Exchange.

Mr. and Mrs. Mink and the Little Minks.

The Minks are a very fine family, and people are glad to see them. Some of their cousins are called Sables, and others Ermines, and all have pretty and costly clothes. The mother Mink is a beautiful brown creature with a very long tail, about as large as an English hare, quite slender and graceful. All the Minks and Martens wear two fur coats, one above the other. The under one is short and woolly, and sticks close to the skin, keeping its wearer warm in coldest weather and dry in deepest water. The outer coat has long, glossy hair which throws off the rain as does the thatch of a cottage.

When our boys and girls want to bathe in the sea, they must take lots of trouble, wear a special bathing dress, and be careful not to take cold, nor spend too much time dressing.

The little Minks and Martens and their numerous cousins can spend as much time as they please in the water. Their costly fur dresses can stand all sorts of mud and dirt and water. All they have to do when tired of their bath is to shake themselves and run about in the sunshine, and they are all right again. These happy little people live on fish and have great fun in catching them. They catch the fish as they need them, and seem perfectly satisfied; but now and then a special dainty in the shape of a fat frog or sleek, shining lizard comes their way and then there is a wonderful commotion. And I am sorry to say that these good little fisherfolk will quarrel and fight just like any other common wild creatures.—E. A. Matthews, in Sunbeam.

How He Did It.

Mrs. Russell Sage taught school in her youth in Philadelphia, and a Philadelphia woman who was once her pupil, said the other day:

"She had a way of hammering home an idea with an apt anecdote that we girls enjoyed hugely.

"One day, in impressing on us the importance of perseverance, she said that she knew a little boy who was a remarkably fine skater.

"She watched the youngster one winter afternoon do the front and back roll, the grapevine, the glide, and other feats, and finally, overcome with enthusiasm, she patted him on the back and said:

"'How on earth, at your age, did you learn to skate so magnificently?'

"'By getting up every time I fell down,' was the boy's simple answer."

Intolerant of Hindrances.

A Swede started out as a missionary to India, and some friends tried to dissuade him from his errand. "Why, man," they said "it is so hot there you can't live. It is 120 degrees in the shade. "Vell" said the Swede in great contempt "ve don't have to stay in the shade, do ve?" It was entirely possible, he thought, for any man to find larger hardships if the smaller ones were too trying.—Robert E. Speer.

A Trip to a Star.

"Let us suppose a railway to have been built between the earth and the nearest star. "By a consideration of this railway's workings we can get some idea of the enormous distance that intervenes between Centauri and us.

"Suppose that I should decide to take a trip on this new aerial line to the fixed star. I ask the ticket agent what the fare is, and he answers:

"'The fare is very low, sir. It is only a cent each hundred miles.'

"'And what, at that rate, will the through ticket one way cost?' I ask.

"'It will cost just $2,750,000,' he answers.

"I pay for my ticket and board the train. We set off at a tremendous rate.

"'How fast,' I ask the brakeman, are we going?'

"'Sixty miles an hour, sir,' says he, 'and it's a through train. There are no stops.'

"'We'll soon be there, then, won't we?' I resume.

"'We'll make good time,' says the brakeman.

"'And when will we arrive?"

"'In just 48,633,000 years.'"

—Many schools that have not heretofore used our Bible helps order a given number of "The Teachers' Quarterly." They yet fail to realize that we have 4 independent grades of teachers' quarterlies. Order as many as you need for either the primary, junior, intermediate, or senior departments.

—We are welcoming a great multitude of new Bible schools into the ranks of our patrons. It is needless to say they will have much better literature than they had last year, while our own old patrons will realize that Brother Dowling is greatly enriching our peerless series through the use he is making of Brother Marion Stevenson.

Brother Dowling is exceptionally helpful in this department of the scriptures. Secure the book for your own needs. There is none other as good for $1.00. It will make a most appropriate Christmas gift to a friend.

The Diamond Anniversary at Bedford, Ohio.

it has given to the world. Few churches possess so much musical talent. This was well used during the sessions of the anniversary. One of the interesting features was the song, "The Little Brown Church in the Dell," sung by six ladies who had sung it at an entertainment in the church when little girls, in 1856.

The communion service will never be forgotten. Lathrop Cooley, who sixty-five years ago had preached in Bedford, was at one side of the table and F. M. Green, who first visited Bedford sixty-one years ago, was at the other side. It was a solemn and sweet hour to all present.

The church was never in a better condition than now. The fellowship is ideal and the spirit beautiful. There are no bosses or factions. It is indeed a people in whom the spirit of God dwells. The immediate need is a better house of worship in a more favorable location. But time will meet that demand. C. A. Freer.

The Man of Cheer.

We love the man with a smile, the man with the roses on his tongue, the man who sees your boy's dirty face, but mentions his bright eyes, who notices your shabby coat but praises your studious habits, the man who sees all the faults but whose tongue is quick to praise and slow to blame. We like to meet a man whose smile will light up dreariness, whose voice is full of the music of the birds, whose hand-shake is an inspiration, and his "God bless you" a benediction. He makes us forget our troubles as the raven's dismal croak is forgotten when the wood thrush or the brown thrasher sings. God bless the men of cheer!

There is plenty of trouble here, but we need not increase it. There is a lot of dying ahead of time. They are living men who have already crossed Jordan two or three times, and, unfortunately, they are not of the type who "cross the river of Jordan happy in the Lord," but who sing, if they sing at all, dismalest, dreariest, deadliest music. The very tone is fatal to happiness. If you have faith, preach it; if you have doubts, bury them. If you have joy, share it; if you have sorrow, bear it. Find the bright side of things—God's side—and help others to get sight of it also.

Union Gospel Songs

With the assistance of Singing Evangelist Leonard Daugherty and J. H. Rosecrans we have prepared a new song book that constitutes one of the best offerings we have yet made to the psalmody of the church.

It is called Union Gospel Songs because it unites in itself the best of the best old songs, as well as the most helpful and popular of the newer candidates for popular favor—234 in all; and also because it unites features making it equally valuable for regular church work as well as for the Bible school, prayer-meeting and eyangelistic services.

No expense has been spared in securing copyrights of desirable music and in sending forth strongly and handsomely bound volumes.

Limp Cloth—25 cts. per copy, postpaid; $16 per 100, not prepaid.
Board—30 cts. per copy, postpaid; $20 per 100, not prepaid.
Cloth—35 cts. per copy, postpaid; $3.50 per doz. not prepaid; $25 per 100, not prepaid.

The space usually accorded a self-laudatory preface, the Editors have modestly given to the "Doxology" and "The Lord Is In His Holy Temple."

The merits of this book predict it will quickly come into widespread usefulness. We wish to accelerate this movement. Samples will be sent on application, on condition they be returned if order does not follow.

The President's Message.

The message which the President presented to Congress at the opening of its session was not an oooch-making document. He makes many recommendations, some of a somewhat radical character, but says nothing strikingly new on any topic of first rate importance. A revision of the currency law to secure greater elasticity is recommended, but no specific program is urged. Tariff revision after the election is suggested, but the tariff on wood-pulp used in paper manufacture should be removed at once. The Sherman anti-trust law should be amended so that only bad combinations will be outlawed. A plan of federal incorporation or federal license for railway companies doing interstate business is recommended. The imposition of an inheritance tax is suggested and, if it can be done constitutionally, a graduated income tax. The plan for a deep waterway down the Mississippi is approved and other measures looking to the conservation and development of natural resources are brought to the attention of Congress. An increase in the army is asked and an appropriation is requested for the building of four additional battleships and a corresponding number of smaller vessels for the navy. The President recommends the establishment of postal savings banks and the extension of the parcels post. His most radical suggestion is that the campaign expenses of the great parties be met by an appropriation by Congress, thus obviating the necessity for contributions from corporations.

The Gyro-Car.

Tops have been toys for many centuries, but few efforts have been made to make practical use of the principle on which the top works. The principle is that any body which is rotating rapidly tends to continue rotating in the same plane. This tendency to rotate in the same plane prevents it from tipping over. So the gyroscope, an elaborate form of top with revolving wheels within wheels, appears to defy the law of gravitation. An English inventor, Mr. Louis Brennan, has applied the principle of the gyroscope most ingeniously in the construction of a railway car which runs on one rail and is kept in equilibrium by the action of a pair of rapidly revolving flywheels which operate as a gyroscope. Mr. Brennan is a practical and successful inventor who is in charge of a factory which manufactures for the British government a torpedo of his own invention, the steering gear of which embodies the same principle. After many years of experiment he has apparently perfected a car which will run on a single rail or cable (not suspended from it, but in equilibrium upon it) with a smoothness and safety unknown to the common double-railed car. The British War Department, a concern which is indisposed to sudden excitement over new things, has made an appropriation to enable Mr. Brennan to build a larger car than his present successful model. It seems not improbable that the invention will mark one of the great revolutionary steps in the development of transportation methods. McClure's for December contains an interesting account of it.

Arm-Chair Officers.

An order recently issued by the President makes it clear that arm-chair officers are not to be tolerated in the army. Every officer must be able to ride with his command. An army officer must be physically fit to ride for three days in a test march, covering thirty miles a day. Those who can not meet the test will be retired. This is well, so far as it is an incentive to the officers to keep themselves in good physical condition by exercise and temperate living. But there are many army officers, in the engineering corps, for example, whose value and efficiency are quite independent of their skill in horsemanship or their physical endurance. War has become a very technical profession and the most valuable man in it is not necessarily the Richard Coeur de Lion of gigantic strength. Sometimes a man who can not ride much can plan and construct extremely well.

Paternalism.

The alleged paternalism of the present administartion, and especially the recent action in the sale of bonds to relieve the panic, suggests the remark of a little girl who was saying her prayers one night when the flurry was at its worst. After a comprehensive and detailed petition for the welfare of each member of the family and numerous friends, she concluded: "And, O Lord, be awful careful of yourself, because we have only you and the President to depend on, and papa does not like the way he is acting just now."

The Swedish Monarch.

Europe has lost one of its grand monarchs. Oscar II. of Sweden was great in size and great in heart and might be properly entitled to the same characterization in regard to his mental culture. He was born in 1829 and became king in 1872. He gave much attention to internal improvements, added greatly to the efficiency of the army and reorganized the railroad system. His life in many respects as ruler corresponded with the ideas of the great English statesman, Gladstone. Oscar set himself against "the Napoleonic idea," allayed the friction between Swedes and Norwegians and in his kingly democracy promoted the work of local self-government. He is succeeded by a bluff and hearty son of whom the people speak well.

Over-Education in Germany.

Germany, the true home of higher education, is said to be suffering from over-education, which is quite a different thing. So many men have been educated in the professions and also in the non-professional branches of university work that the professions are over-crowded and technically trained men command miserably small salaries. This situation suggests two comments. The first is that any process of genuine education, enlarging a man's powers, broadening his view of the world and developing his appreciation of the best things, carries with it a real benefit even if it does not bring increased earning capacity. The other is that it is an ill-adjusted system of education which issues in an over-crowding in any group of callings. No nation can have too many intelligent and trained men, but a nation can have too many intelligent men trying to practice law or medicine or trying to secure positions as university professors. What is evidently needed is that the trades and handicrafts should be held more in honor, and that education should lead to these callings as well as to the professions. It is a false idea of education which assumes that education must take a man out of business or agriculture or the practice of a trade.

When John Wesley was asked the secret of the efficiency of his followers, he replied: "They are all at it and always at it. Each new adherent is not only set to work, but kept at work."

Editorial

"The Heart of the Gospel." III.*

On "The Rationale of the Cross," the author holds that the two things that can be confidently affirmed of the death of Christ upon the cross are that it is "revelatory and instrumental." That is, it is a revelation of God's measureless love, which can find no higher expression, and also of his righteousness. "It shows the fixed hostility of the divine nature to sin. It is instrumental because it is the weapon which God uses in the extermination of sin. It is such a demonstration of divine love as makes the highest appeal to the deepest there is in the human heart. What humanity needed, above everything else, was an adequate revelation of divine love. To know God as love is to know what is most essential in him, and is to come into possession of the life eternal. That is the reason why God has been at so great pains to reveal himself. The delay of this revelation through the cross was because it could not have been understood sooner. 'In due season Christ died for the ungodly."

As to the vicarious nature of Christ's suffering, this is no strange incident in the life of humanity. It is seen in operation everywhere, even in nature. It is seen in every true home, and is a principle of social action, without which society could not exist. As Harnack remarks, the principle that "everywhere that the just man suffers an atonement is made which puts us to shame and purifies us, is a truth which is indestructibly preserved in the moral experience of mankind." This principle of vicarious suffering needs special emphasis in the social and industrial life of to-day. "No more imperative duty," says our author, "rests upon the Christian teachers of to-day than that of bringing the law of sacrifice into practical operation in all our social realms. Business is largely fratricidal. Men seek their own. Self-interest is allowed to degenerate into selfishness. The golden rule is trampled under foot; instead of sacrifice for others, we have the sacrifice of others. How to expel the demon of selfishness, how to awaken brotherly interest, how to lead men to love their neighbors as themselves, is the core of the social problem. All else belongs to the outside. To this problem Christianity offers the only real solution. Society is to be saved by the spirit of Christ's sacrifice entering into it." (p. 131)

A chapter on "The Wholeness of Christ's Work" cautions against regarding the death of Christ as something apart from his life and ministry. To be properly understood, it must be considered in its right relation to his life. "The work of Christ," he says "is a unity, covering the whole of his life from the manger to the cross. Incarnation is the starting point, death its center, and resurrection its completion. The death of Christ is not separated from his incarnation on the one hand, or from his resurrection on the other. All are parts of one redemptive unity; all are instinct with one redemptive purpose." This work of Christ is summed up in the words of St. John: "We know that he was manifested to take away our sins." This self-manifestation began with his incarnation and culminated in his death. Still, the author recognizes the truth that "Death, the great revealer, made known the Christ to the world as nothing else could have done. In the suffering, dying Christ we see into the depth of the divine heart as we could do nowhere else."

Space forbids us to deal adequately with other chapters such as that on "The Consciousness of Jesus," showing that he was conscious of his sinlessness and of his Messianic mission, and later that that mission could only be accomplished through his death; and on "The Personal Equation," pointing out that our salvation is not only through Christ but in Christ—"in whom we have redemption through his blood". We are not saved by something called the work of Christ, but by Christ himself. What the author seems to guard against here is in putting too much stress upon theories in the abstract, and losing sight of the Christ himself who alone is Saviour. "He is himself the sum and substance of the gospel message." In his chapter, "The Atonement as an Ethical Force," the author shows that the "ultimate end of the Atonement is restored character." The enabling power of the cross secures obedience on the part of man to God which was not possible before. On the Atonement as "The Evangelical Motive," emphasis is laid on the power of the cross as the mightiest motive for bringing men to God. "When men are brought to believe that Christ really died for their sins upon the cross, no other fact in all history can ever move them so profoundly and awaken in them such a feeling of boundless devotion" (p. 161).

Other chapters are on "The Objective and Subjective Relations," on "The Function of Faith," on the Atonement "A Spiritual Reality," which must find its counterpart in human experience, and on "The Cross an Appeal to the Imagination"; on "The Sacraments and the Atonement," showing the relation of baptism and the Lord's supper to the death of Christ; on "The Holy Spirit and the Atonement," in which the Atonement of Christ is said to be the chief medium through which the Holy Spirit works for the salvation of the world; on "The Atonement Continuous," in which Christ is pointed out as still suffering, being crucified afresh by our sins, and on "Social Bearings," showing that through the Atonement "man is set right in the whole circle of his Godward and manward relations"; on "The Timelessness of the Atonement," showing that the death of Christ was retrospective as well as prospective, and that it was "the expression of an eternal principle existing in the depths of the divine nature; and, finally, on "The Purpose of the Ages Fulfilled in the Atonement," in which is is pointed out that "the fruition of God's eternal purpose is the reconciliation of all things to himself by Jesus Christ, the fusion of the kingdoms of this world into a universal kingdom of righteousness," and that "around the cross the centuries circle," and that "in its light the life of man is being transfigured." Some strictures on the work are reserved for another article.

*"The Heart of the Gospel," by Rev. James M. Campbell, D. D. Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago and New York.

Is the Bible Sectarian?

This question has been answered the affirmative by the decision of the Chicago School Board which, a few days ago, voted not to permit scriptural selections, which had been prepared for that purpose, to be used in the public schools. The reason assigned for this action was that the use of such literature "might result in evoking distrust of the integrity and unsectarian character of the schools." Not only is the Bible to be excluded and extracts from the Bible, but all books containing scriptural quotations are placed under the ban.

We can see valid objections to the introduction of the Bible as a text book in the public schools. Few public school teachers would be competent to teach it without importing into it their ignorant and partial views that would be bound to make it offensive to some. But we are unable to discover any reason why a wise selection of Bible readings containing the sublimest literature and the purest morality and the highest ideals of character, should be branded as "sectarian." No doubt the names of Greek and Roman heroes and even the heathen gods can be mentioned or sung, as these are "nonsectarian"; but the name of Jesus must be excluded because its use would be a sectarianism! Of course the hand of the Jew and of the infidel is the determining factor in such a decision. These are the objectors. It is not that Jesus Christ is a sectarian, or that the lofty teaching of the Bible is narrow and prescriptive in its spirit, but such a teacher and such teaching are seen to be antagonistic to the sectarianism of these Jews and Agnostics.

Some day we shall have a ruling from the highest court in the country as to whether selections from the writings of Isaiah, Amos, Paul, John and the teachings of Jesus, are antagonistic to the unsectarian character of our public schools. But whatever this decision may be, there can be no question of the imperative need of a more faithful teaching of the Bible in our homes, in our churches and in our Bible schools.

A Study of Current Problems.

I. Introductory.

Every movement among men, whether religious, social or governmental, that grows, is constantly facing new problems. If it should die, there is only the simple problem of decent interment to be dealt with; but if it lives and grows, and accomplishes, in some measure, the purpose for which it was originated, it is continually facing new conditions which demand new adaptations of means to ends, new adjustments of forces to facts, new alignments, etc., and all these make new problems. The government of the United States is facing many of these new problems today, and they call for the highest order of statesmanship, and the loftiest devotion to the public good. But we are to study another class of problems—those which arise from the growth and development of our own current reformatory movement in the religious world.

Whatever else our critics may have said of this religious movement, it has never been charged with being dead or inactive. Nor has anyone denied that it has had a marvelous growth and expansion. In the very nature of things, this growth in numbers, in wealth, in social position, in influence, and in organization and equipment has involved many problems in the past, most of which have been satisfactorily solved. For instance, we have had to face the question of missionary organization—that is, whether we have the right to form any such organization, not specifically mentioned in the New Testament, for the spread of the gospel at home and abroad. The solution reached was, that we not only have the right to use such means as are necessary to carry out divine commands, but that we are under the highest obligations to do so; but that in the use of plans and methods for carrying out Christ's command to preach the gospel, we must not violate any precept or principle of the New Testament. Within that limit we have perfect freedom to use such methods as reason and experience may approve. That was a great step forward, and our real progress in missionary work and most rapid growth, dates from the solution of that problem.

Not long afterwards, there arose the question as to our right to use instrumental music in the worship in our public assemblies. The conclusion reached, by the great majority of us, at least, after much discussion, was that as the New Testament does not specify what aids we may use in our worship, such as church buildings, with pulpits and pews, music books, with printed words and notes, neither does it specify instrumental music, nor should it be expected so to do, since the New Testament is not a book of statutes, but of principles; that as printed music is a guide to the eye so the music of the organ is a guide to the ear, and that the office of each of these is to help praise God effectively in the service of song.

There were those who even opposed the Sunday-school as an unauthorized agency; but it was not long till all reasonable persons saw that it was a most important means of carrying out the divine command to teach. Later on, the Christian Endeavor movement was denounced as an unscriptural innovation with which we could have nothing to do, as it was a recognition of denominationalism, and the pledge actually required the young people to be loyal to their own churches! It did not take long, however, for the common sense of the people to triumph over these superficial objections, and to utilize a movement that had in it such possibilities of spiritual development for our young people.

Then came the question of federation, or the closer co-operation of the different evangelical Protestant churches for the accomplishment of such aims and objects as they hold in common. This, too, met with fierce opposition on the ground that it was "a recognition of denominationalism," and that to co-operate with denominations was to be denominationalized. It was only a few weeks since that a great meeting of representative brethren from all parts of the country passed its verdict in favor of such co-operation as was proposed by the great Inter-Church Conference in New York City, in November, 1905. That meeting declared that it was in perfect harmony with the spirit and aim of our religious movement to co-operate with all other Christians as far as it is possible for us to do so in loyalty to our own position and plea, as a means of hastening the unity for which Jesus prayed.

In saying that these problems have all been solved, we do not mean that on any of them there is perfect unanimity of opinion, but that the consensus of judgment, among the really representative men and women of our churches, is overwhelmingly in favor of the conclusions we have stated. And no one who has studied history to any profit can doubt that opposition to these conclusions will be a rapidly diminishing force. It is a noteworthy fact that all these problems, thus far, have been questions of Christian liberty, and that Christian liberty has triumphed in each case over the narrower view which would limit and circumscribe the freedom of action and influence of the brotherhood. Just as Paul's view of a universal Christianity triumphed over the narrower interpretation of the Judaizers of his day, so in every great contest, from that day to this, in which Christian freedom has met Jewish legalism on the field of battle, the victory has ultimately been on the side of liberty. Whenever liberty has degenerated into license, that, too, has been vanquished by the liberty which is Christian.

The practical problems we have mentioned could be paralleled by doctrinal questions which have also arisen and which have been solved. But let it suffice, for our present purpose, to say that along with the solution of these practical questions, there has been steadily growing a more spiritual interpretation of our plea and mission, increased emphasis upon the things which are vital and fundamental, less tendency to disputation, a wider feeling of brotherhood, and a deepening sense of obligation to stand true to the great aim of the fathers in promoting the unity of the people of God.

But we have not yet solved all our problems, because we have not yet completed our growth, and our mission in the world. This historical resume is but preliminary to the discussion of some of the living problems which yet confront us, and in the study of which we shall hope for the co-operation of those who have at heart the continuous prosperity and growth of this great movement within the church for its unity, and for its purity in faith, and doctrine, and life.

Important Announcement.

George L. Snively, who has been employed in the business department of the Christian Publishing Company since January 1, 1906, as General Superintendent, and under whose energetic management the business of the company has grown, and the circulation of all our publications has increased, has heard the call of the pastorate, which, indeed, has never ceased to appeal to him, and has resigned his connection with the company to devote himself once more to his ministerial calling. His resignation is to take effect at the end of the present calendar year.

W. Daviess Pittman, one of the well-known business men of St. Louis, who has also done excellent work as a lay preacher in connection with his large business interests, has been employed to succeed Brother Snively as General Superintendent, having purchased his interest in the company, and will enter upon his work with the beginning of the new year. We are justified, in view of Brother Pittman's past experience and success in managing large business enterprises, in anticipating the continuous growth of the business of this company, which this year reaches its highest mark.

Notes and Comments.

The following item of news, which we clip from a personal letter from S. T. Willis, of New York City, will, we are sure, be of interest to our readers:

"You will be pleased to know that the Baptist Ministers conference of New York invited all our ministers in New York to attend their meeting yesterday, and unanimously voted to open their doors to us and accept us as members. This they did, and we all joined the conference. This is the list: S. T. Willis, M. L. Bates, J. P. Lichtenberger, L. N. D. Wells and D. H. Bradbury. Dr. Goodchild read one of the best papers on 'Union of the Baptists, Free Baptists and the Disciples.' It will be sent to you for publication in THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST."

While the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST was preaching in Boston in 1885-6, he was voted in as an honorary member of the Baptist Ministerial Alliance in that city, and found a congenial home with his Baptist brethren. In cities where this can be done it will be found helpful, no doubt, in promoting the unity of the churches in these bodies.

On our first page this week will be found a revised list of our "Centennial Aims," which we commend to the careful study of all our readers. There is not one of these aims (26 in number) that does not present a most worthy ideal for which to labor. Notice those for the individual and those for the congregation. Here are twelve things which, if realized, would simply revolutionize our work and send us forward on our conquering way with a bound and an impetus that nothing could resist. These twelve individual and congregational aims, even approximately reached, would insure more than the realization of those aims listed under the general heads of "Institutional" and "General." Let preachers and Sunday-school teachers hold these aims up before our churches and Bible schools and emphasize their value. With these distinct and worthy aims before us we ought to make notable progress between now and our Centennial celebration.

What will be the exact date of our Centennial celebration? Why not make it the first week in September, 1909, and make the eighth day of September (which would be exactly one hundred years from the publication of the Declaration and Address) "the great day of the feast"? There would be great propriety in having the date of the convention accord precisely with the great historic event which it commemorates. And then the season of the year would make it far more favorable for a large convention such as we hope to assemble in Pittsburg at that time. The only objection likely to be suggested is, that it would cut a month off of our missionary year; but this could be anticipated by collections, in a large measure, and the reports made to include eleven months, and the full report of the year be published in October. It would be better to have the full reports published a month after the convention, or to have the missionary year close with August, instead of September, than to have the celebration a month behind time. At least, so it seems to us. We throw out the suggestion for the brethren to think about.

The men of the Union Avenue Christian Church held their monthly meeting on Tuesday evening of last week. It was addressed by Dr. W. T. Moore on "John Bull in His Castle," which proved to be a fascinating theme to his auditors. Refreshments were served after the lecture, and the president, W. P. Clarkson, called for an expression of opinion on the best way of making these meetings profitable. A number of short and enthusiastic speeches were made, all of them emphasizing the value of such an organization for men, and the necessity of holding the regular monthly meetings. These local organizations of men are now being formed in nearly all our best churches. It will be easy to weld these into a national organization that will tell mightily on our general enterprises.

These are times that try men's souls and reveal what manner of persons they are. It is no great test of one's faith and love for the cause that he can be liberal in supporting the work of God when money is plenty, but to carry forward great enterprises in a time like the present—that tries the stuff of which we are made. You can tie to the man or the church that does not flinch at a time like this.

Mr. T. C. MacMillan, the new Moderator of the Congregationalist National Council, used a courting illustration similar to that used by W. T. Moore in the federation discussion at the Indianapolis Congress. Mr. MacMillan's explanation of the difficulties which have arisen in the way of the proposed tri-church union is both reasonable and naive. He says:

"You have watched two lovers before they actually became engaged. There is a certain number of moonlight nights, of delightful things said and of hands held. And this is quite right and proper. Every well-regulated marriage begins in this delicious way. Thus it is with these churches. We are a-wooing now. Do not expect us to marry at once. We can not hasten the growth of love. First you will see us agree on a sensible plan of co-operation. That will be our engagement. Finally, but perhaps not till the lapse of years, we shall effect an organic union. That will be our marriage."

There is from time to time evidence of a straining after up-to-dateness, not to use the word "sensationalism" in some church announcements. True up-to-dateness no one can find fault with. It simply means that a church is alive and doing the work it was intended to do. There is a progressiveness that is simply business energy. The "Western Christian Advocate" points out that its publishing company is in no sense behind the times, for it is authority for the statement that during the hot days, when there was not much sale for works on theology, the window of the Methodist Book Concern was filled "with Teddy Bears, and with any number of ten-cent books, telling how the Teddy Bears went to school, went fishing, went to the circus, got into hot water, slid on the toboggan, got caught in a smash-up, came to life again, went on a lark—some eight or ten volumes altogether."—Thus hath our strenuous President taken captive conservative officialdom.

The "Baptist Argus" has an editorial in a recent number under the heading, "The Disciples' Trouble Grows." The reference, of course, is to the recent controversy wherein some of the officers of our Foreign Society were under fire, but the "Argus" also brings in the question of the unrest among many of the young ministers in our ranks, and it seems to see a possible schism. The opinion of the "Argus" does not take into consideration the spirit of the Norfolk convention. It comments as follows:

"Our Disciple brethren are having growing pains. We Baptists know all about that. And we know, too, what it is to have schisms. We recall the Hardshell schism, and the Disciple schism, and, just the other day, the Anti-board schism. We are getting used to schisms. There are worse things, and our Disciple brethren may find that out some day."

From the continued exclamations in some quarters we are ready to agree with our contemporary that some Disciples are decidedly affected by some kind of pains. We sincerely hope they will grow out of them.

The "Congregationalist" thinks that now that Thanksgiving is past we may remind ourselves that gratitude for blessings received should not always be expressed publicly. A lady in Croydon, London, England, returned to the dead letter office a letter with this endorsement: "Please don't send this man's letters here—gone away fifteen months, thank God!" She was sentenced at a trial by jury to pay the addressee twenty-five dollars and costs. She might perhaps, says our contemporary, have saved herself if she had simply labeled the missive, after an eminent example, "Undesirable Citizen."

What did he pay for his pew, and how much did he give to help some poor soul without a breakfast? These questions are suggested by the announcement that some New Yorker recently paid one hundred thousand dollars for the famous "Diamond Horseshoe" box at the Metropolitan Opera House. We suggest a new tax—on spendthrift society functions.

Editor's Easy Chair.

"About this season of the year," as the old-fashioned almanac would say, look out for squalls and multitudes of Christmas shoppers crowding the down-town streets. Christmas is a coming event which each year casts its shadow farther and farther before. It already monopolizes the whole of December, and threatens to overshadow Thanksgiving Day. "Early Christmas shopping to avoid the crowds" has become a sort of newspaper slogan, reflecting, no doubt, the sentiments of the advertiser. On the whole, it is no doubt wise advice, but one doubts whereunto this thing will lead. The other holidays of the year have a right to be jealous, lest Christmas crowd them out of the calendar, or so eclipse them as to render them of little importance. No doubt Christmas lends itself most readily to commercial thrift and a revival of trade, and it is to be feared that this aspect of Christmas is quite overshadowing the real meaning of the day. How shall it be remedied? Christmas is a season of gift-making, and gifts must be purchased, or at least the material for them. This stimulates trade, and hence the very kindliness of people at this season of the year is coined into business profits by those who know how to supply what people want. Let us see to 't, however, that the commercial side of Christmas does not become the chief feature of the celebration. It is well to recall the event which the day commemorates, and seek to catch the spirit of him who, when on earth, had not where to lay his head.

If one goes down into the business streets of the city these evenings, and sees the teeming throngs of people shopping, and notes the burdens which they are carrying home, he will find it difficult to realize that there is a monetary stringency which is said to be holding the country in its relentless grasp. As a vault-opener and anti-money-hoarder, Santa Claus can give Secretary Cortelyou several points. The merry old optimist of the sled and reindeer laughs at the idea of money-hoarding keeping him from distributing his usual gifts among the people. The spirit of generosity which characterizes the Christmas season is more than a match for any pessimistic outlook which would put a veto on the exchange of gifts. Even the Scrooges find their miserly hearts warming under the genial glow of the Christmastide, and make investments in charity and kindly deeds which they would not think of doing at any other season of the year. It is safe to remind our readers again, as we have often done, that the surest way to have a happy Christmas is to plan some gift or deed of kindness to those who can not repay you in kind. In making others happy we find our own highest happiness. The poor, which we always have with us, are sure to appreciate and be grateful for any small gift which will brighten their lives and make them feel that they have a part in the joy and blessings of the great Christmas festival.

The greatest possible benefit we can get out of the Christmas season is to catch such a supply of the spirit of Him whose birth the day celebrates as will last us throughout the whole year. Nothing is more needed in our relations with each other than the spirit of kindliness and of charity which Jesus taught and exemplified in his own life. One has but to observe how the principle of selfishness rules so largely in the business and commercial world, and how even in the church itself, where we have a right to expect the prevalence of Christ's spirit, there are exhibitions of narrowness, bitterness, misrepresentation and strife, to realize how far we are yet from being completely Christianized. What a glorious world this would be to live in if we could eliminate sin and selfishness and all hatreds and strifes and evil speakings, and if men everywhere should love each other as brothers and reach out helping hands to each other, and bear each other's burdens! Paul speaks of a "glorious church" that is yet to be. Would not that "glorious church" be here now if all Christians loved each other as Christ loved them, and they should seek to help instead of hurt each other? How all our denominational walls would tumble down before such a spirit, and how the spirit of faction and strife which is marring the peace within local churches and within the several religious bodies would slink a-before the radiance of that charity which way int the pit whence it emanates "thinketh no evil" and which "endureth long and is kind!" We may hasten the coming of such a church by each of us manifesting the spirit of our Master, and avoiding controversy with those whose spirit is not that of unity and fraternity.

A recent topic for our prayer-meetings was, "How God reveals his truth to us in our troubles." The theme proved to be a very fruitful and helpful one in the prayer-meeting which the "Easy Chair" attends. The incident of the young man who was with Elisha at Dothan when they were surrounded by the Syrian hosts was referred to as an illustration of how God reveals himself to us in our difficulties. In answer to Elisha's prayer the young man's eyes were opened to see the hills round about them covered with the chariots of God, but it is clear that had they been backed up by a stronger army than those of the Syrians they would have seen no spiritual reinforcements. "Man's extremity is God's opportunity." Strange we never realize our spiritual resources in God until earthly sources of strength and help fail us. It isn't that God wants us to have trouble, but he wants us to rely upon him, and to receive the truth which he has for us, and we are often unprepared to do either until calamity in some form overtakes us. We never know what a present help God is unless in time of trouble we look to him for strength. We never know our own possibilities, with God's help, until troubles and difficulties multiply and throw us back upon ourselves, and we accomplish feats of endurance and achievement of which we had no conception before. Our example is never so illuminating and stimulating to others as when, in the face of great trials and sorrows, we maintain a calm and serene faith and an undaunted courage, and so reveal to others what God can do for one who commits himself to his care. If it be true, then, that God can show us his highest truth and his greatest mercies in time of tribulation and trial, why should we shrink from them when, in God's Providence, they come upon us?

In the kaleidoscopic life of an editor, the scene of his literary work changes frequently. The foregoing paragraphs were dictated in our office "Easy Chair." This is written on board a passenger express train, and we are looking at the world through the window of a Pullman parlor car. It is a gray winter day, and the leaden skies above have their counterpart below in the leafless trees, the brown stubblefields and fields of cornstalks from whose empty husks the corn has been gathered and cribbed. Piles of wood for winter fires are in evidence, and the fattening swine in their pens are a prophecy of an approaching tragedy of which the victims are wholly unconscious. Here and there, near some farm house a turkey gobbler is strutting with a degree of pride and unconcern about the future which is wholly unjustified by the proximity of Christmas! These Missouri farmers are evidently prepared for winter, so far as material comforts are concerned, but we hope they are not neglecting preparation for a profitable use of the stormy days which will keep them indoors, and the long winter evenings, when books and papers and magazines will prove a source of entertainment and instruction. Blessings on the farmers on whom we are all dependent, under God, for our daily bread! Blessings on the boys and girls who are being reared on these farms, and trained to lives of industry and independence, and to love home, country and God! Of such is the government of these United States.

Ministerial Relief and the Centennial

By W. R. Warren

July 4th, 1844, a great celebration was held in Lexington, Mo. All the surrounding country was searched for veterans of the Revolutionary War. Only two could be found. The place of honor in the Independence Day parade and festivities was given to them. Everybody was at their service. No want of theirs, expressed or guessed, was left unsatisfied. They were the men who had made the day, and all the other Independence Days that were and are to follow.

In 1909 we come to the great Centennial Convention in Pittsburg. We will search out all our pioneers and bring along every one that is able to travel. Those who remain at home will be feted there. The post of honor will be accorded to all who reach the Centennial city. Nothing will be too good for them then. But meanwhile—what if some of them should die of neglect, before the great day arrives!

And after the Centennial, what? Shall the tide of enthusiasm and gratitude be allowed to run out and leave no permanent and practical provision for the necessities of God's servants whom we honor?

Whatever we are going to do, now is the time to be about it. Whatever is to be done, you should have a share in it. Take the offering on December 15. Send a personal gift for the Permanent Fund to the Board of Ministerial Relief, 34 Union Trust Building, Indianapolis, Indiana. The aim is—Relief for All Disabled Ministers; Permanent Fund $:00,000.

"The Doers of the Law Shall Be Justified"

An Exposition of Roman 2:13.

By Prof. I. B. Grubbs

How can Paul make this statement, and yet say in Rom. 3:20 in setting forth the great doctrine of the epistle that "by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified," basing his statement upon the fact that "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God," and therefore can only be "justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus"? If "doers of the law shall be justified," how can it be true that "by the works of the law"—i. e. by doing the things required by the law—"shall no flesh be justified"?

The apparent contradiction disappears when we consider that all men may be "doers of the law" to the point of moral and spiritual excellence, while no man can be a "doer of the law" to the point of moral and spiritual perfection. It is this last that is required by the law, in order to legal justification. For it is written: "Cursed is every one that continues not in all the things that are writte in the book of the law to do them." (Gal. 3:10.) Such a faultless doing of the law with its consequent justification, apart from grace, from faith, from Christ, is impossible for sinful man. Hence the apostle's affirmation that "by the works of the law shall no flesh" [no human being] "be justified."

But there is a most important sense in which men not only can, but must be doers of the law, to rightfully expect any spiritual blessing from God. When he gave through Moses his law to the children of Israel, he intended and exacted obedience to its precepts. He promised to bless them if they obeyed and threatened to punish them if they disobeyed; and he kept his word to the letter in both cases. Though they could not be perfect, they could be good and pious men in the measure of goodness and piety divinely required. And this ability was distinctly recognized in the giving of the law. Hear the utterance of the great Law-Giver in Deut. 30:11-14. "This commandment which I command thee this day, it is not too hard for thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven, that thou shouldest say: Who shall go up for us to heaven, and b ing it unto us, and make us to hear it ' t we may do it? Neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go over the sea for us, and bring it unto us and make us to hear it, that we may do it? But the word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart that thou mayest do it."

So, too, the gospel itself in demanding repentance, which involves an abandonment of an immoral life, enforces obedience to the divine law in its moral aspects—obedience in the sense above defined, or, obedience to the point of moral and spiritual excellence. For although a man may be moral without being a Christian, no man can be a Christian without being moral. "Do we then," says the apostle, "make the law of none effect through faith? Nay, we establish the law." And Jesus, himself, says: "Think not that I came to destroy the law, or the prophets. I came, not to destroy, but to fulfill." When, therefore, the law is said to be "done away" (2 Cor. 3:10), and that Christians "are not under the law, but under grace" (Rom. 6:14), the meaning is that they are not under the law as "the ministration of condemnation," since "Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law," though all, even angels, are under it forever as a moral code of eternal obligation. This statement, as will be seen further on, from the nature of Paul's reasoning, is strictly applicable t the great moral features of the divine law, which reflect the unchangeable attributes of God, and has no reference to positive and repealable requirements, like circumcision, and the seventh-day sabbath.

Now the context clearly shows that the passage in Romans 2:13 refers to a possible keeping of the law as a condition of a possible justification; for the apostle immediately adds, by way of illustration, that when Gentiles, who have not the law, do by nature the things of the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves, in that they show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness therewith," etc. When therefore, he says that the doers of the law shall be justified, he evidently speaks of such a doing of the law as could be manifested, even by Gentiles, without a knowledge of the law in written form, as possessed by the Jews. As far as the law was written in their hearts, they could, in the measure of their knowledge and ability, be doers of the law to the point of moral excellence, and uprightness of life; and this as an indispensable condition of gracious justification through the redemptive work of Christ. Note the negative side of the contrast which introduces the statement on which we are commenting. "Not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified." P ul has in mind the difference between a mere hearer of the law, and one who honors the law in his conduct before God and man. Alluding to an important privilege enjoyed by the Jews in hearing the divine law read on every sabbath day, the apostle draws a striking and instructive contrast between a Jewish hearer, who was not a doer, and a Gentile doer who was not a hearer of the word of God, representing the latter, and not the former, as finding justification before God—a justification, however, which as based on the divine mercy is wholly at variance with legal justification, which, as demanding moral perfection, is beyond the reach of both Jews and Gentiles.

Expositors generally, if not universally, give an interpretation of the passage under consideration which conflicts with the clear teaching of the context. Alford, for example, asserts that the apostle, in the statement that "the doers of the law shall be justified," was simply "keeping to general principles, and not touching, as yet, on the impossibility of being thus justified." We have seen that both the doing of the law referred to, and the justification conditioned thereon, are not only possible, but actually realized in the case of Gentiles, who are doers of the law in the measure of their knowledge of the law, as written in their h rts. Paul is not here describing legal justification, which, as grounded on a faultless observance of the law is impossible for sinful men, as shown in Rom. 3:20, and which, in fact, enters into the essence of his great argument against legalistic claims, and in behalf of justification through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. But he i showing in Rom. 2:13, 14, that no one can properly hope to be justified in any way, who is only entertained by the hearing of the law and who fails to exemplify its moral teachings in his daily deportment.

Finally, we ought to observe that the context of the passage before us throws much light, as do some other passages, on Paul's use of the term "law," in his great argument on justification. In reasoning with Jewish legalists, he would, of course, refer, for the most part, to the Mosaic code. Yet, that law is but one form of the great divine law before his mind—a higher form, indeed, than its form as written in the hearts of untaught Gentiles, but lower than its form as exemplified in the moral demands of Christianity. And here we fully agree with Dean Alford when he says: "There is but one law of God"—one eternal moral law—"partly written in men's consciences, more plainly manifested in the law of Moses, and fully revealed in Jesus Christ."

Forcing the Millenium

By William Durban

Here in London, close to St. Paul's Cathedral, and therefore "Under the Dome," like Brother Power, but with a difference in longitude of over 3,000 miles, I hav been surveying things that have mixed themselves chaotically. I will seek to unravel a few of them. I have at times been told that our American friends do not take much interest in things British. Sometimes by excellent Americans I have been treated to this remark, but, curiously enough, these same good Americans have been the most inquisitive and interested persons as to British affairs and conditions that could possibly be encountered. But, even if Americans were really indifferent to our insular and imperial doings, I think that I could for once stir a little sympathetic interest in the minds of my readers. For we have come to a peculiar pass in both countries. I understand that a stupendous crisis has arisen in the United States and that the outlook is so bewildering that no man can venture to predict anything concerning the possible development. Immense potentialities attach to the near future, but these are absolutely indefinable. Therefore I invite my kind American readers to attend with special interest to some outlines of the situation on the European side of the Atlantic, seeing that the prospect is clearer, and some of the indications of what is likely to happen may be interpreted without rashness.

Pepper and Gas for Women.

A great revolt is in progress on the part of the intellectuals in our circle of British womanhood. It is rapidly becoming impossible for any statesman to speak at a political meeting with peace and quietness. Every day the attempt is made during the Parliamentary recess, and on each occasion the proceedings are violently interrupted by clever, demonstrative, and determined women, who raise in chorus shouts of "Votes for Women," and as the appointed stewards at once become "chuckers out," free fights take place and all is confusion. In great meetings Mr. Asquith, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Haldane, Minister of War, two of the most eloquent and popular of the Liberal Cabinet, have found it impossible to gain a hearing. And now, the tables are turned. For where the Suffragettes are holding meetings, crowds of students and other young men gather for the sake of smashing the chance of a hearing by the Amazons. These young gentlemen do not scruple to fling about cayenne pepper, to open bottles of sulphuretted hydrogen, and to throw mice on the platforms. My own impression is that the women will win eventually, but that their methods have been both wise and unwise. They were right in actively demonstrating the impatience they felt, but wrong in breaking up gatherings of the Liberal party, seeing that this is the very party to which they acknowledge they can alone look with any hope for the promotion of their cause. They know that the Tories are the implacable foes of the female suffrage, and yet they have left the Tory meetings unmolested. Liberals favor female suffrage, but the women who call for votes are angry because Sir Henry Campbell and his ministers do not bring in a bill and do not promise to do so at an early date. So the women are trying to force a millenium.

Revolutionary Socialism at the City Temple.

I have taken further opportunities of listening to the Thursday sermons of the Rev. R. J. Campbell at the City Temple. These discourses grow in power and eloquence. Mr. Campbell is certainly a magnetic speaker, yet he has few dramatic or rhetorical gifts. At the same time he waxes both rhetorical and dramatic under excitement in every sermon since he took his extraordinary new departure. He is now the great pulpit Socialist of England. And he is also a great platform Socialist. I heard him exclaim that if Jesus were here he would be the Revolutionary Socialist of these days. But I noted that on the same occasion Mr. Campbell boldly showed where Jesus was wrong in his expectations as to what was to eventuate. Mr. Campbell does not for a moment believe in an infallible Christ. He thinks that Jesus was very much mistaken even about his own death and resurrection. Of course he was obliged ingeniously to try to explain certain sayings of Jesus about his own destiny. I always try to be fair to Mr. Campbell, because of his great position, his personal excellence, and his evident sincerity. But at the same time I appreciate the force of the sarcasm of a genial but very candid critic who recently said, "Mr. Campbell is calling for new heavens and a new earth, with himself as the only competent general manager." Mr. Campbell is not altogether addicted to euphemisms, and he certainly provokes counter-criticism. I myself as I listened to him only a few days since heard him declare in a violently sweeping generalization that the religious press was "a rotten institution." He gave the religious press no credit for any higher motive that that of making money. You will not wonder that this has been at once indignantly resented. It was one of the most unjustifiable imputations ever uttered by any Christian minister. It is plain that, as Mr. Campbell lately addressed an immense Socialistic meeting at the Alexandra Palace in the most fervent terms, denouncing the present social system most unsparingly, just as he does constantly in the pulpit, he is also now to be counted amongst the enthusiasts who are seeking to force the Millennium which we all desire, but which most of us feel must be waited for until humanity is better fitted by a general change of moral character for a happier environment. We cannot force the Millennium. It will come of itself when humanity is fit for it, and a fitter humanity will usher it in.

Across the Channel.

Of course, living so close to France, we in London are deeply interested in the ferment and the broil in Gallican politics and Gallican ecclesiasticism. There in France certain feverish Progressives have been also seeking to force the Millennium. They have failed. The French Socialists under

BOTH GAINED

Man and Wife Fatten on Grape-Nuts.

The notion that meat is necessary for real strength and the foundation of solid flesh is now no longer as prevalent as formerly.

Excessive meat eaters are usually sluggish a part of the time because they are not able to fully digest their food, and the undigested portion is changed into what is practically a kind of poison that acts upon the blood and nerves, thus getting all through the system.

"I was a heavy meat eater," writes an Ills. man, "and up to two years ago, was in very poor health. I suffered with indigestion so that I only weighed 95 pounds.

"Then I heard about Grape-Nuts and decided to try it. My wife laughed at me at first but when I gained to 125 pounds and felt so fine, she thought she would eat Grape-Nuts too.

"Now she is fat and well and has gained 40 pounds. We never have indigestion any more and seldom feel the desire for meat. A neighbor of ours, 68 years old, was troubled with indigestion for years; was a hearty meat eater, and now since he has been eating Grape-Nuts regularly, he says he is well and never has indigestion. I could name a lot of persons who have really been cured of indigestion by changing from a heavy meat diet to Grape-Nuts." "There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

the leadership of Herve have split from those who follow Juares. The schism can not be healed. Socialism in France is closely identified with atheism. It has flung up all faith, all religion, all sanctity, and has exiled God from the universe. But these Socialists of France dream that they can rig up a universe of libertinism, of secularism, of free-love, and of freedom to sin, enthroning the devil in the place of God and worshiping the lusts of the flesh as the only idols in the pantheon of the social revolution. This is the actual typical Socialism of France, though of course here and there representatives spring up of a nobler type. But these do not count and are not heeded. The rank and file of the French Socialists are simply spiritual anarchists. They would if they could force a devil's Millennium. What France needs is what was expressed in the words of one of her reformers of the last generation—"The only hope of my country is a reversion to Puritanism." And the prayer of all the friends of "La Grande Nation," should be, "Dieu protege la France!"

A GOOD INVESTMENT By C. O. Ewing

What a Bible School Did for a Louisville Church.

We are all looking for a safe investment in these times of financial disturbances. The Broadway congregation of Louisville, Ky., has recently invested in a Sunday-School Revival on which it is receiving dividends daily instead of semi-annually.

The question of Sunday-School Revival was first brought before the official board of the Broadway Church by our pastor, W. N. Briney. The suggestion at once met with the most hearty approval of every member present.

I knew nothing of Miss Eva Lemert or her methods, but felt that if she was a trained Sunday-School worker the undertaking would be a pronounced success.

Having been superintendent of our school I at once recognized the importance of such an undertaking. It would give the school the prominence it should have in church work. It would resul in a stronger and better church. If we receive 85 per cent of our church recruits from the Sunday-School why not make it just as strong as possible? I am of the opinion that the Sunday-School has too long been neglected. If we are to have a strong spiritual membership we must have the very best school possible. With this end in view we undertook the SundaySchool Revival.

Our people were thoroughly prepared for the work when Miss Lemert arrived. With the most hearty co-operation of the active workers she was soon able to double our enrollment. I think a word in regard to Miss Lemert's plans is not out of place. She works only for permanent results; indulging in no boom or exciting methods. She is perfectly sound in all of her teachings and does not put herself prominently in the forefront. Being modest and retiring, she prefers to direct the movements of the workers and keep herself in the backg ound.

The best evidence that the work done during this revival is permanent is that it has not lagged, in the least, since Miss Lemert's departure. I have been connected with this church all of my life and I consider this revival the best investment it has ever made. The expenses were all paid and a handsome balance left in the treasury without a single plea for money.

I am of the opinion that this movement for better Sunday-Schools will soon become a national effort.

I have asked several others connected with our school to write their impressions of the revival, which they have gladly done.

This is what our pastor, W. N. Briney, says:

Under instructions from Miss Lemert, we made careful preparation for her coming. For weeks the program of our fall work had been spoken of from the pulpit, and the Sunday before Miss Lemert's arrival cards were distributed in both school and church announcing the beginning of the Bible school revival the following Wednesday night. On Monday circular letters were mailed to every member of the church. Monday night a meeting of the district visitors was held, a large section of the city having previously been divided into convenient districts. Wednesday night Miss Lemert faced a fine crowd of happy and expectant people. She did not disappoint them, but in her simple, quiet, business-like way filled all present with an earnest desire to build up a great school. Every one went out from that meeting with an invitation upon his lips for every one he met, who was not an attendant at any Bible School, to come to Broadway. Thursday night the workers reported that about one hundred and sixty promises had been secured from persons not members of any Bible school, to come to Broadway the following Sunday. About th same number were reported on Friday night. On that brigh and beautiful first Sunday morning in October they began to come in, some singly, but the great majority in groups of from two to ten, the old scholars oringing in troops of new ones. Early in the hour the Superintendent sent the janitor up-stairs to pull up the partitions between the Bible school room and the auditorium. When the school assembled after the classes, there was a whole church full of bright and happy faces. When the secretary announced that we had reached the number we set out to gain, the applause was delightfully hearty and spontaneous. Thus it went on during the four weeks Miss Lemert was with us. Our average attendance for the year up to the first of October had been about 200. During October the average attendance was 491, and the average offerin was $46. The offerings paid all the expenses of the revival. The enrollment of the adult Bible class was increased from 25 to 90, the Young Men's Bible class from 15 to 75, the Young Women's Bible class from 14 to 50, and other classes in proportion.

Enough time has elapsed since Miss Lemert left us to give a safe indication as to the permanency of the work done under her leadership. The average attendance for November has been just 400, and the offering has never fallen below $20. A street car strike in progress in Louisville greatly inconvenienced our people last Sunday, and affected the attendance somewhat. The permanent results of the revival have thus been beyond our most sanguine expectations. Our church and school will never be what they were before Miss Lemert came. We now have the idea of big things into our heads, and expect to go right along with the work. We have outgrown our accommodations, and a committee has already been appointed by our official board to enlarge our capacity. Our hope is to have a modern Bible School equipment. The whole church feels the

MEMORY IMPROVED

Since Leaving Off Coffee.

Many persons suff from poor memory who never suspect coffee has any thing to do with it.

The drug—caffeine—in coffee, acts injuriously on the nerves and heart, causing imperfect circulation, too much in the brain at one time, too little in another part. This often causes a dullness which makes a good memory nearly impossible.

"I am nearly 70 years old and did not know that coffee was the cause of the stomach and heart trouble I suffered from for many years, until about four years ago," writes a Kans. woman.

"A kind neighbor induced me to quit coffee and try Postum. I had been suffering severely and was greatly reduced in flesh. After using Postum a little while I found myself improving; my heart beats became regular and now I seldom ever notice any symptoms of my old stomach trouble at all. My nerves are steady and my memory decidedly better than while I was using coffee.

"I like the taste of Postum fully as well as coffee. My sister told me two years ago that she did not like it, but when I showed her how to make it according to directions, she thought it was delicious.

"It is best to pour cold water over your Postum, let it come to a boil, then boil 15 minutes. That brings out the flavor and full food value."

impetus of the Bible School revival. We had ten special services in the church during the last two weeks of the revival, and 46 persons came into the church, and 15 others have come in since. We are thoroughly convinced that the future of the Broadway church depends upon the prosperity of the Bible School. That is why we sent for Miss Lemert. The results fully justify the effort. It was a great success from every point of view. Our prospects are brighter than ever before. For Miss Lemert and her work we have the very highest regard, and she has surely won a secure place in the affections of the Broadway people.

The following is from our superintendent, Forrest L. Moseley:

It has been my heart's desire to have a Bible School revival ever since I have been superintendent, but I could never get the steps to be taken clearly in my mind. When Miss Eva Lemert came into our midst she made it so clear and easy, that we had no trouble in doubling our school. The beauty of it all is that there is no end to the growth of such work, for she makes it possible for every member of the school to be doing something, and when we begin working for a thing, we immediately find ourselves very much interested, and consequently soon have some one else interested. You know the old saying, "nothing succeeds like success," and we found that to be true with our revival, for we have secured regular pupils who claim they have never been in the Bible School—but church members for many years.

Our revival has set aside the old idea that parents should always send their children to the Bible School. It also does away with the idea that when a boy or girl reaches the age of sixteen or eighteen, they are too old to attend Bible school. Our greatest gain is in the adult classes, and that makes the parents bring their children instead of sending them, thereby leaving no time in life, when one can leave off this great work. We paid all our extra expenses, and our school has been very much strengthened financially, so we are much better able to take care of our current expenses. A committee to make arrangements to build a room large enough to accommodate our school has been appointed, as we have completely outgrown our old quarters.

There are many reasons, too numerous to mention, why a Bible School should have a revival, such as can be conducted by Miss Eva Lemert, and I heartily recommend her plans to anybody. If you are doubtful in regard to the matter, try it once, and you most certainly will be convinced of her great work.

Prof. W. H. Bartholomew is principal of the Louisvile Girls High School, an elder in the Broadway church, and teacher of the Bible class in the Sunday-School. He gives his impressions of the revival as follows:

Miss Lemert impressed me as a woman of faith in God and his word, and full of Christian enthusiasm. Her methods were conservative, that is, they were based upon pyschological principles; a practical knowledge of which she gained by the study of the doctrine and methods of Jesus in enlightening the minds, purifying the hearts, and directing through these, the wills of mankind. Hence, she always, as her Savior did, clearly distinguished the means from the ends in every process involving duty and conscience. Illustrations, incidents, the text books, etc., and even the teacher were only means to lead the minds of the children to have faith in Christ, and to exercise a prompt and loving obedience to his commands, which must ever be the end of all Bible school efforts. It is in the Bible school that the children are trained for intelligent Christian service.

Miss Lemert emphasized time and again that the Bible is the only text book of the Lord's day school, for as Paul said to Timothy, "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." In the preparation of the Bible lessons from time to time the thoughts of the Bible on the subject of the lesson should be first studied; after that commentaries, encyclopedias, etc., may be consulted. But, when the teacher comes before his class, he should exclude the latter that the word of God may occupy its proper position in the minds and hearts of his students. Further, the word of God is the sword of the spirit, and it is in the Lord's day school that a knowledge of its qualities and purposes are gained that it may be effectively wielded in the time to come. Scriptural or religious ideas are accurately expressed in the language of the Bible, hence it is inconceivable that the wisdom of men can suggest any improvement of the same. The best way, then, to enforce Christian truth and duty is to use liberally the language inspired of God. And, further, inspired illustrations will illumine the text more and better than those suggested by the human mind. How essential, therefore, that the children should become familiar with the very words of the Bible.

This is an epitome of Miss Lemert's work while she was with us and may the Lord bless her, keep her and cause his face ever to shine upon her.

The Geography of Missions

By W. T. Moore

Progress is never in straight lines. It is either circular or is zig-zag in its course. There is really no exception to this rule. Indeed, the whole universe seems to be constructed upon the principle here indicated. From the smallest molecule to the largest world that rolls in space, everything is circular in form, and everything moves in certain orbits which are practically as definitely described as the movements of the planets.

Now is it not well to study the course of missions in harmony with its universal law? And by so doing, may we not find an additional reason for a missionary spirit that will carry the cross into the nations that lie west of us, since not only the star of empire westward takes its way, but also the star of Bethlehem follows the same direction? If we will study a trustworthy map of the world, we shall probably be astonished to find that the gospel has never made progress in the direction of the east. It is true that we are accustomed to speak of many of the old civilizations as belonging to the East, whereas as a matter of fact, most of them lie west of us. Christianity began in Palestine, which lies east of us. It spread at first chiefly south, and then north and west until it largely reached most of the countries of western Asia, some of the countries of Africa, and nearly the whole of Europe. But the singular fact which needs to be emphatically noted is that it did not spread toward the east. More than two-thirds of Asia and all of the islands of the Pacific remained untouched. In due time the North Atlantic was crossed, and from Plymouth Rock and Jamestown the gospel began to be preached on this great western continent. For a time it remained here. During this stationary period, efforts were made to reach those countries which lie east of Europe through European missions. These efforts were only partially successful. Indeed, compared with the work to be done, they amounted to practically very little. The reason for this is not far to see. The course of missions is not eastward, but westward. This being true, it is impossible to hope that the non-Christian countries lying east of Europe will ever be conquered by European missions. These countries must be reached through America, and this lays upon American Christians an overwhelming obligation. All the countries lying west of us must be christianized through influences flowing westward. We must reach China, Japan, Siberia, the Philippine Islands and Australia by the way of America. This is the high road that leads to success, and when these nations shall receive the gospel, it will continue to travel westward until it reaches the place from which it started, and then perhaps it may overrun Europe again with an added increment of strength by reason of its contact with oriental civilizations. Nor is it impossible to suppose that crossing the Atlantic again it will come back to these United States with a new force of spiritual power.

But some one may say the time is yet long before this can possibly happen. Not so long as we might think. We are living in a wonderful age. The world has come to be a very litle sphere. We can go around it in comparatively a few days. Civilization is moving on at rapid strides. The Bible is being translated into all languages. Missionary activity was never so great as at the present time. We simply need to get our true bearing and keep our flag moving in the right direction. Our first duty is to the western nations lying next to us, such as Japan, China, Asiatic Russia, etc., and then these nations will carry the gospel on westward —Randolph Cook, financial secretary of Oklahoma Christian University, reports that there are now 200 students enrolled, representing sixteen states. Over forty of them are studying for the ministry.

—W. G. Johnston writes in commendatory terms of Jas. Mailley, minister at Greensburg, Ind., who helped him in a meeting at Lawrenceburg, one of the most difficult fields in the state for gathering accessions.

—The work at Philipsburg, Pa., is prospering. There have been numerous additions and $2,500 paid on a $3,800 lot. This congregation has granted its minister, D. F. Harris, the privilege of holding a meeting for some other church after the holidays.

—The Vine Street Church, Nashville, Tenn., hopes to become a living-link in the Foreign Society this year by paying $600. They even hope to go up to $1,000, if it is possible. Our churches in the South are taking on new life and their enlarged interest in world-wide missions registers a larger interest in every good work.

—The churches in Tuscarawas County, Ohio become a living-link in the Foreign Society and will support a missionary on the foreign field in the future. This is a decided step in advance, and C. B. Reynolds, of New Philadelphia, and Chas. Darsie, of Uhrichsville, are to be congratulated upon their leadership in this enterprise.

—The office of J. Fred Jones for the state work of Illinois, is still at Bloomington and not at Stanford, as was made to appear in a recent issue. Brother Jones' home is at Stanford, but mail sent to him there may be delayed. Address, Illinois Christian Missionary Society, Bloomington, for all business connected with the state work.

—Our church at Murray, Ky., has just taken the collection for home missions. Two hundred dollars was the amount aimed for, and twenty-five dollars in excess of this was received. This congregation has in the past few years built one of the handsomest church buildings in any town of the size in the state. E. B. Bourland is the minister.

—Jas. R. McIntire reports from Grand Island, Neb., that his congregation has voted to begin the preparation at once for a great evangelistic campaign next fall, under the leadership of some well-known evangelist. Brother McIntire is very cordial in his appreciation of the assistance of F. E. Day, pastor of the church at Nelson, in a recent meeting.

—Signs of promise at Monett, Mo., appear in the fact that the Bible school is steadily growing. A teacher-training class has lately been organized and is doing well. The entire church board joins their minister in tithing their income for the Lord, while several of the families are voluntarily doing the same. A union temperance movement has been started in the town.

—Oliver Cook reports that the young men of the church at Columbus, Kan., are now doing excellent work in the ministry, Elmer Larson preaching at Hollowell and Fred Lee giving his time to two churches while taking work in the State University. Fred Hood, another young man who recently united with the church, will enter upon some kind of religious work, perhaps that of Y. M. C. A. secretary.

—"We feel as though we were holding revival meetings all the time." So writes Ada L. Forster, who is minister of the church at Fairmount, Minn., where rapid growth is reported. This cause has been established only two years and as yet there is no building. The field, like many towns in Minnesota, is not an easy one, but the brethren believe that success will attend their efforts.

—M. M. Nelson, state evangelist of Colorado, sends us a report from Durango, in the following terms: "We have just set sail a new ship of Zion, built on the pattern given by the Holy Spirit through the apostles. Fifty-four passengers were enrolled last Lord's day. The ship will be for the service of God and the salvation of men. May she surmount every wave and anchor at last in the harbor of the blessed."

—W. E. Spicer writes us from Pittsfield, Ill., that a telephone message from Chambersburg brought him the sad news of the death of Gilbert A. Gish. Brother Gish was in the midst of a fine meeting with home forces. He had preached his sermon, dismissed the congregation, and died in a few minutes after reaching his home. He was a young man who was making a splendid record, and the Pike county churches will feel his loss.

—The congregation of the First Church, Paducah, Ky., having been without a pastor for more than a year, was not in the best condition when Samuel B. Moore recently entered upon the work there. Since he came, prosperity has attended them. Nearly $2,000, we understand, has been spent on improvements, and the ladies of the church have a considerable sum in hand for redecorating the auditorium, which is one of the best in the city.

—Robert Simons became pastor of the Christian church at Pleasant Hill, Mo., last June, since which time there have been twenty additions to the congregation, seven of them by confession and baptism, and a considerable amount of money has been raised and spent in repairing the building. The church is ready for a forward movement. Joseph Gaylor is now in a meeting there, a C. E. Society has been organized and a hot local option campaign is being waged.

—The First Christian Church at Portsmouth, O., is about to organize a second congregation in the east end of that city. A canvass has been conducted under the leadership of J. P. Myers, the minister, and sufficient pledges secured to hope that an active young minister may, by the co-operation of the state board, be placed in this field which is bright with promise. The community numbers about 30,000 people, and it is believed that a second church will be self-supporting.

—The congregation of the Howett Street Christian Chapel, Peoria, Ill., is very happy in the donation of an addition for the accommodation of their Bible school. This was made necessary by the growth of the work. Brother Rotchford, the Sunday-school Superintendent, acted as chairman. Mrs. Simonson and H. F. Burns contributed to the occasion, and Wm. Price, the pastor, gave the dedicatory address, his subject being "The Church and the Community." This enlargement will lead to a greater work.

—J. E. Denton has closed his work at Petaluma, Cal., and entered upon ministry to the church at Richmond. The congregation he leaves is in good condition. The Bible school has trebled its attendance and there were thirty-seven additions to the church membership. The church has paid a better salary to its minister, it has contributed liberally to missionary enterprises, raising last year for all purposes more than $2,000, with a membership numbering less than one hundred. A good man is in view to take this work. One of the chief inducements leading to Brother Denton's going to Richmond, is the fact that this is near Berkley where is located the University with other educational advantages for his family.

—W. J. Dodge was asked by a little band of disciples at Claremore, Ok., to hold a revival and dedicate their building. S. R. Hawkins, who was to have helped, was only able to be present at the evening service. Over $1,000 was raised, which, under the stress of the financial condition, was more than the brethren expected. This town is one of the best in that section of the new state, and Brother Dodge reports a good feeling toward the church. There is a fine field for evangelistic work in neighboring villages. The membership contains some splendid material, and it is hoped that a minister may soon be located there. Parties interested may write to S. R. Hawkins, South McAlester, or to R. A. Atkisson, Claremore, Oklahoma.

—Our church at Texarkana, Texas, has had a successful year. Nathaniel Jacks is the minister, and is able to report 244 additions at home and 61 in outside engagements. The financial record shows over $7,000 raised, $5,900 of this being by the church, and nearly $900 by the Ladies' Aid. Every condition seems hopeful and assuring. The membership has been more than doubled; the Bible-school gained more than 300 per cent; the Ladies' Aid is now one of the largest in the brotherhood, and, under the untiring leadership of Mrs. Ben Foreman, further success will reward it. The society has adopted an orphan in the Grand Prairie Home, and he is expected to develop into a preacher. Supt. Andrew Rose and a faithful corps of teachers are responsible largely for the phenomenal success in the Bible school. Many improvements have been put upon the property, which is estimated to be worth more than $40,000. The Central Church stands for both Arkansas and Texas, its membership being made up about equally from the two states.

—The Endeavor Society at Bushton, Ill., has been reorganized and J. A. Lytle reports a growth of interest in the general work.

—The Bible school at Montgomery, W. Va., continues to increase, the enrollment now reaching 203 and the Home mission offering $42. So writes George F. Crites.

—E. W. Allen's congregation at Wichita, Kan., is planning for a Scoville meeting next spring. They have a fine teacher-training class and all the church work is victorious.

—Z. E. Bates is the minister of a splendid church at Atchison, Kan., where the work moves auspiciously with large congregations. This church observes all the special offerings.

—A thank offering of $200 was taken at the delightful anniversary services at Keokuk, Ia., on November 24. This church is prospering, in every way, under the leadership of M. J. Nicoson.

—An Endeavor Society was organized at Skidmore, Mo., September 22, with a membership of ten. It is now able to report sixty-eight members, and active for usefulness. Winn R. Matsler is the minister.

—J. J. Limerick, minister of the church at Dinuba, Cal., writes that the brethren there will not soon forget the services rendered to them by Cal Ogburn, of Bakersfield, and Mrs. W. W. Pew, of Fowler, in their recent meeting.

—The Bible school at Ash Grove, Mo., is rapidly increasing in numbers under the superintendency of W. S. Barnett. A good meeting has just been held at this place by David Millar. The church is forging ahead under the leadership of B. F. Norris.

—E. C. Tuckerman, who was united with Brother Wilhite in some fine meetings, will join forces with C. R. L. Vawter in January, when they begin a meeting in West Virginia. Mrs. Tuckerman, who is a splendid personal worker, will also assist.

—The Bible school at Huntington, Ind., has an average attendance of over 500. More than this number signed the temperance pledge on the recent occasion of the world's temperance day. Brother Shelburne is able to report the general work in fine condition.

—Lew D. Hill expects to give all his time now to Christian work. He preaches at Bushnell and hopes to get things thoroughly established soon. He is engaged there until February 1. Churches wanting meetings after that date may write him at Blandinsville.

—T. A. Abbott very cordially commends George A. Butler, our blind singing evangelist, who is a very worthy man. He has just closed a successful eight-months' engagement in Oregon, and churches desiring his services can address him for the present at Mound City, Mo.

—A beautiful new house of worship for the congregation meeting at Anderson Avenue, Knoxville, Tenn., has just been dedicated by L. L. Carpenter. There is great rejoicing because of large congregations, great enthusiasm and generous giving. Percy T. Carnes is the successful minister.

—President A. McLean and Secretary Stephen J. Corey, of the Foreign Society, are making a vigorous and successful campaign conducting Foreign Missionary rallies. These missionary institutes are becoming increasingly useful in imparting missionary information and are creating missionary interest in the foreign work.

—Excavation for the foundation of the new church at Aurora, Mo., has been made, but G. E. Prewitt, the minister, writes that the panic may work some hardship in the matter of the building. The local option fight, which has just closed there, was a victory for temperance by more than two votes to one; and this is a mining town.

—Joseph Gaylor's fine meeting at Duenweg, Mo., had, as one result, the raising of $1,700 to pay for the new auditorium, one-third of this coming from new members. One hundred of the additions were grown people, and fifty of them men, many of influence in the town and county. Bother Gaylor says the saloons have received their death blow through this meeting, and he prophesies that the church there will, in five years, be the strongest congregation in Southwest Missouri. He is now in a meeting at Pleasant Hill, with Robert Simons.

—Morton Gregory, who has made such a success of the work of the Central Christian Church, Walla Walla, Wash., writes us that S. G. Fisher has just been chosen to succeed him as pastor. The Central Church is one of the largest and best organized churches in the West, and the brethren feel that under Brother Fisher's leadership success will continue to crown their efforts. From the letter-head of the paper on which he writes, we gather that Brother Gregory has gone into business life, in the capacity of president of an insurance society. Whether he will continue to preach as occasion offers, we are not informed.

—Before this copy of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST reaches the hands of some of our readers, Miss Bertha Caroline Mason will have become Mrs. James Henry Fuller. THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has received an invitation from Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Mason to attend the marriage of their daughter, on December 12, at the Oak Cliff Christian Church, Dallas, Tex., to the minister of our church at Sherman, in that state. We congratulate all parties. Brother Fuller is a minister who has accomplished much good in the Lord's work, and we scarcely know what the C. W. B. M. work in the state will do without "Sister Bertha", as she was so widely known. Perhaps, however, she will continue to take some active interest in its larger field, though the state of her health may prevent this.

—Dr. W. T. Moore addressed the men of the Union Avenue Christian Church at the inauguration of their winter session last week. Brother Moore went on to Pittsburg to meet the Board of Bethany College, to discuss plans for accomplishing the work he has set his hand in trying to raise an endowment of half a million dollars for the college founded by Alexander Campbell. It is to be hoped that all our preachers will take this matter at once into consideration and not let next Education Day (which is the third Sunday in January) pass without seeking to raise on an average of one dollar per member in their congregations. With two years in which to secure the dollar there should not be the least difficulty. Any Christian Endeavor Society or Bible school could raise the whole apportionment for its church by putting into force a self-denial ordinance in the matter of ice-cream and soda water for a few weeks.

—H. R. Ford has resigned as pastor of the church at East Dallas, Texas, to take effect January 1. He will then have served as pastor there three years. Brother Ford has not, we believe, made any definite plans for his future work. The church at East Dallas has been established just over four years. This church is supporting Dr. Minnie Rioch in India, under the Foreign Board, and helping to support a pastor in one of the weaker churches in Dallas, through the Home Board. It will also assist another of the weaker churches in that city as soon as the right man can be found for it. Over $1,600 has been raised for missions, benevolence and education. The membership was increased by 51, and the financial receipts amounted to over $7,000. A new lot, costing $8,500 has been purchased and plans completed for a new building, and the future of the church, if it secures a good pastor to follow Brother Ford, has the brightest promise. During his three years of ministry there were 380 additions, the total receipts being $19,300, over $3,200 going to missions.

Bethany Assembly—Silver Anniversary.

Twenty-five years ago Bethany Assembly (Chautauqua) was organized. Next summer will be the silver anniversary. We ought, before our coming meeting, to put thousands of dollars of improvements on our grounds, and to present a program worthy so great a brotherhood as Bethany Assembly represents. It was organized by the largest state convention ever convened in Indiana.

One share of stock in the assembly costs $20. Every preacher of the Christian Church in Indiana ought to be a stockholder. Will not each church raise the $20 and present the minister with one share of stock?

We also ask the Disciples of Indiana to give the assembly at least $1 as a silver offering for this glad anniversary. Many brethren in other states will be very glad to join in this fitting celebration. We hope and believe that these offerings will be prompt and unanimous. If any Disciple in Indiana can not send us $1 please write us and give us your sympathy. We shall hope to hear from brethren in many other states.

Eureka College.

The movement inaugurated at the Jacksonville convention to secure eighty people, who will give $25 a year each, for five years, to support a man in the field in the interest of Eureka College, is meeting with favor. The committee now has sixty names, and quite a number have taken the matter under advisement. It is very important, however, that we finish this matter at once.

Quite a number of us are beginning to feel that the thing of great importance among our people at the present time is the college problem. Our colleges must be endowed. We will need our schools worse during the second century of our movement than we did during the first. Many of the men entering the restoration movement in the early days received their training in other schools. The time has come when this matter must be looked after largely by ourselves. The man who believes in our plea and who believes that we have a permanent mission must be interested in the cause of Christian education.

Just as soon as the preparatory work is completed, namely, as soon as we get the eighty people, plans will be outlined for a vigorous five years' campaign in the interest of Eureka College. We will need the hearty co-operation of every member of the Christian Church in Illinois, and we will certainly expect the fellowship of the Alumni Association.

The Georgia State Convention.

The annual state convention of the Churches of Christ in Georgia, consisting of 200 delegates, was royally entertained by the First Church, Atlanta, November 18-21. The great Wilson-Lintt meeting was in progress and occupied every convention evening except Monday, at which time Ira M. Boswell, of Chattanooga, delivered a sparkling address in behalf of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. Tuesday the Woman's Society for Georgia Missions and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions held successful and entertaining sessions. Mrs. M. E. Harlan, of Indianapolis, and Mrs. M. R. Ford, returned missionary from Porto Rico, were present and added much to the interest of C. W. B. M. session. Wednesday and Thursday were devoted to the Georgia Christian Missionary Society, during which time masterly addresses were delivered by our national secretaries, G. W. Muckley, J. H. Mohorter, W. J. Wright and W. R. Warren. Roger L. Clark, of Savannah, Ga., delivered a thoughtful address in behalf of ministerial relief. These men and their addresses were enthusiastically received and did untold good.

The work in Georgia has taken on new life and the churches and individuals represented at the convention pledged one-third more for state evangelization than ever before. The pledges together with the amount promised by the American Christian Missionary Society, amount to nearly $4,500. All the members of the state board except two, who asked to be relieved, were re-elected. H. K. Pendleton was chosen president. The next convention goes to the First Church, Augusta. On Thursday at noon, after making a spontaneous offering for Dr. M. B. Doster, who was present and the oldest preacher in Georgia, the convention closed. The closing scene was touching. The preachers, delegates and others present formed into a circle, joined hands and sang "Blest Be the Tie that Binds." J. A. Lord, editor of the "Christian Standard," Cincinnati, attended the convention and had "Standard" supplies on exhibition.

Interesting Men.

At the annual men's luncheon in the church at Eureka, Ill., a few evenings ago, two hundred and ten men sat down. Harry F. Burns, of Peoria, and W. L. Hipsley, of Table Grove, Ill., made the addresses of the evening and they were most excellent. Mr. Hipsley spoke for the business men and presented a plea for manliness and religion that one does not often hear from a man busy with large affairs. Mr. Burns gave a ringing message on the work the church needed to do to meet the times and presented its need of strong men in a way that challenged all that was noble in manhood.

Dr. and Mrs. Dye recently paid this church a visit and it is safe to say that never in its history has it had a day so full of thrilling address. Men not members of the church, and who had ridiculed missions were converted to the idea. Dr. Dye is one of those men who scout out the paths of civilization and of the kingdom of heaven.

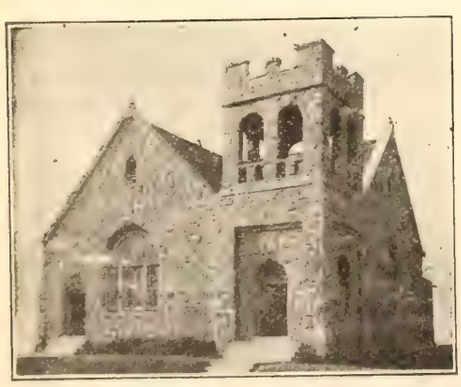
THE TWENTIETH CENTURY CLASS.



We present on this page a photograph of the "Twentieth Century Class," of which R. H. Crossfield, pastor of the First Christian Church, Owensboro, Ky., is the teacher. It has an enrollment of 156 men. Besides the usual officers, it works through the following committees: Welcome new members, seek employment, devotional, absentee, benevolent, entertainment, advertising, finance and up-to-date. The motto is "Only once a stranger." Besides the button which the men wear, they have a "recognition" by which they know each other. Their aim is to have 200 in this class by January 1. This is the largest men's class among the Disciples of Christ in Kentucky. Brother Crossfield, at the banquet which the class enjoyed some nights ago, telling of the purposes of the class, said he would not minimize women, yet he had no sympathy with the perversion of the Biblical story of the creation which said that God, when he went to make woman, put Adam to sleep and took his backbone from him and made woman from it. Not only Bible study, but fellowship with men is the object of the club.

A SEVENTIETH ANNIVERSARY.

On Sunday, November 24, 1907, the Hyde Park Church celebrated the seventieth anniversary of its organization. It is the oldest Christian Church in Kansas City. Three great services were held: A jubilee service at 11 a. m., a pioneers' service at 3 p. m. and a harvest home service at 8 p. m. A. W. Kokendoffer, of Mexico, Mo., was master of ceremonies, preaching morning and night. He secured the balance of $1,800 needed to clear the debt of $5,500 by January 1, 1908. T. P. Haley delivered an address in the afternoon on "Reminiscences of Pioneer Days." The music for this service was furnished by a trio of old-time music masters. Over fifty members of the Old Men's Association were in attendance, the oldest being Calvin Smith, founder of Smithville, Mo., aged 94.

This congregation was organized as a country church by Elder Frank Palmer in 1837. Its first home was a log church built on the farm of Jacob Ragan. This farm is now covered with some of the most beautiful homes of the city. The old site is occupied by the home of Stewart Taylor, 3644 Holmes street, son of J. Z. Taylor, an early pastor of the First Christian Church of Kentucky. In 1847 a brick church was built in the village of Westport, which still stands at the corner of Westport avenue and Central street. The church occupied this building until 1903, when it entered its present home, built under the heroic ministry of Roger H. Fife.

Hyde Park Christian Church, oldest Christian Church in Kansas City.

The church is located at Westport avenue and Main street in one of the finest residence sections of the city. It will be only six blocks further from the new union station than the Long building at Tenth and Grand. It is on the axis of the city's southward progress. Business houses are going up all the way out to it. The city limits are a mile south, and fine residences extend for three miles or more south of our church. In the steady march of the city's southward progress we are destined to be the next of our congregations to become a downtown church. Before another decade goes by we will need to build here a great institutional church, if we expect to fulfill our mission in this strategic field.

I became pastor here a little more than two years ago, during which time we have received almost 300 persons into the church. The present membership is 460. We will use the duplex envelope system next year, and expect to make weekly offerings for missions. We hope to become a living-link on both the home and foreign fields next year.

Louis S. Cupp.

Practicing the Golden Rule.

Last August my daughter and I went to Hubbard, Texas, for a meeting, to a small, somewhat discouraged band of Disciples. I began our meetings with indication of great good being done. One night I preached on the subject, "What Church Shall I Join?" and the Presbyterian minister told me before he left the service that I was the narrowest man he ever saw. A few evenings later the Baptist people began a tabernacle meeting in the same block with us. We continued, and at the close of the meeting steps were taken to secure a minister, and on October 1 I took up the work here. Much prejudice was exhibited in the entire town. A little later the Presbyterian folks began a meeting, and I was the only available song leader in town, and at their solicitation went and took entire charge of the music for their meeting, which created a better feeling for us. During the meeting we organized a pastors' association, and I was elected president. When it came to a selection of the men to give the Thanksgiving address I was chosen for that. A little later the Cumberland Presbytery convened here, and I had charge of the music for the assembly.

None of the churches have large evening crowds, so I began a series of congregational visitations. On a recent Sunday we met at our usual hour, had a short song service dismissed and proceeded altogether to the Methodist Episcopal Church. We have not only preached "Christian Union" from the pulpit, but have endeavored to practice it from the pews as well, and it really has more effect preached in that way, as it then becomes practical. Otherwise it is simply a beautiful theory, doing no one any good whatever.

You remember the good old woman who was asked if she had tried the method of Christ of "heaping coals of fire on the head" of her husband, in order to bring peace into the disturbed home. Her reply was, "No, but I've tried scalding water, and that seemed to have no effect." Many times we have been trying scalding water without good effect; let us now try the golden rule a while, as well as the heaping of coals of fire.

A PLEA FOR THE SMALL CHURCH

For some time I have felt that some one should make a plea for the small church, in localities presenting large opportunities—towns of 1,000 to 25,000 inhabitants, county seat towns, towns with good prospects; yea even our large cities. There are places where we have a few members with pastors that need the very best men of our brotherhood to give them a send-off. There are hundreds of such places where a single meeting would establish a good strong church, if this was conducted by a strong team of evangelists. Even larger returns could be secured than entering some of our large well-pastored churches.

My labors for the past few months in fields of this character have been to me such a blessing that I make this appeal hoping others will seek this experience. I entered five small churches during the year. I did so partly by choice and partly by necessity. When I re-entered the field as an evangelist twelve months ago, the small churches were the first that wrote me concerning meetings. I accepted a few meetings where I thought I saw fertile fields. These proved such blessings that I entered others from choice.

From my actual experience on the firing line I believe that any first-class team of evangelists can enter any city with 60 to 100 members where there is an active minister and conduct a great meeting. I believe it from the following experiences:

At Van Wert, O., a county seat town with 10,000 inhabitants, I conducted a four-Sundays' meeting, which resulted in 91 additions. The church had only 63 active members. It was in many ways a discouraging proposition, but the meeting solved their problems and after months their minister, George W. Watson, writes me they are still booming.

At Chicago Heights, Ill., 25,000 inhabitants, W. S. Lockhart, a scholarly Christian man, who desired to build a work from the ground, gathered around him a few loyal, liberal-hearted Disciples at this fast-growing city, in all a little over a hundred members. Calling me to his aid a large tent was secured. The meeting resulted in 83 additions. They have raised enough to insure a $25,000 building.

This speaks for itself. During the year I have held meetings for a number of our larger churches, some of them having membership of almost 1,000. These resulted in much larger ingatherings, yet when comparison is made I feel that the small church has been most fruitful.

I know that even greater things have been done during the year by other evangelists. We could have twenty other evangelists that could do the same. Suppose we do have 300 to 400 additions to our churches of one to two thousand members, does it mean as much as 100 in a new field, work established and church constructed?

A word concerning the expense of these meetings. They have paid me $100 per week for myself and singer, all our railroad expense, entertainment, advertising, etc. I have gone to some on a collection plan; this has proven even more lucrative to me. I am convinced that any church with an active membership of sixty to one hundred members in a good field can bear the expense of the meeting without feeling the same. These fields need the best men we have, none other can do the work. In conclusion, let us all select some two or three such fields for the coming year. I mean this for the very best men we have in the field. We can then go to the Centennial next year with many new fields taken, much fresh sod broken. I do not mean that we shall abandon the great churches. I am not going to do so myself, but I am going to at least two or three such fields. Come on, brethren, let us help the babes.

THE TEXAS LECTURESHIP.

For three days the people of Abilene have had a spiritual uplift in the lectures and papers furnished for "The Texas Christian Lectureship." All these addresses were of a high order, but some of them require special mention. The devotional studies, by H. E. Luck, were very helpful and truly devotional. The main lecturer this time was Professor Lockhart, who, in a series of papers on "The Wealth of Hebrew Thought," came up to the high standard set by Calhoun, Vankirk, Willett and others. These papers gave us "The wealth of Hebrew thought concerning man, concerning God, concerning covenants, which, by the way, was unusually strong; concerning sacrifices, concerning the Messiah and concerning the kingdom." Lockhart is a safe yet rational teacher, and seems to be just the man for the place he now holds.

E. M. Waits, of Fort Worth, gave a paper on "Signs of the Times," treating tendencies in present day religious thought, which came much nearer satisfying all present than most papers treating this question could possibly do. Waits is a good man and full of the holy spirit. His associate in the First Church of Fort Worth, J. J. Morgan, gave us a strong but rather conservative paper on "The Atonement." Brother Morgan I suppose, is a conservative, but if one concludes that he has not given close study to more than one phase of this question, he makes a very serious mistake. His paper was certainly a helpful one to the preacher. For the question must come up now and then. "How can I present the death of Jesus for the world in such terms that men will cry out, 'What must we do?'"

M. M. Davis, of Dallas, was to review this excellent paper, but for some reason was not present nor did he send his review. Yet with such men as Walter Stairs to lead in the discussion the various theories of the atonement received their share of attention from those present.

A. Clark was not present to give us his address on "The Demand for Young Men for the Ministry," yet quite a number of speeches were made setting forth the unusual demand just now for well-trained, consecrated young men for the Christian ministry.

E. H. Holmes, of Plano, discussed the question of "Our Relation to Other Christians." Brother Holmes admitted in harmony with our teaching in the past that there are "other Christians" besides those belonging to our distinct movement in behalf of undenominational Christianity. And he admitted that they should be treated as such. Yet it was the judgment of some that he "nodded" when he came to church federation. But as this paper is to be published I shall not comment. It was the opinion of several that if "our people" were only let alone by the religious press they would continue to co-operate with other Christians whenever and wherever they could do so with free speech and an open Bible.

W. K. Homan was not present to give us a paper on "Qualifications for the Christian Ministry." But Colby D. Hall and A. E. Dubber led in a very satisfactory discussion of this all-important theme. I do not remember a lectureship or congress where the discussions were more general and yet there was not one unkind word spoken in all that was said. The lectureship and the congress are the places in which to settle our differences and not in our religious papers. Our next lectureship goes to Waco and the University Church. J. J. Morgan is the next president and Arthur Jones the secretary. The attendance here was not large.

Especially interesting are the chapters on the five minutes before and after death.' $.75.

—The Authority of Christ. By David W Forest of Edinburg. 'It appears to me that those who maintain a genuine historical incarnation of the Son of God have not always sufficiently recognized the limitations in an incarnate life, nor how vital is the illumination of the Spirit, operating through the best activities of men's minds and hearts, for the discovery of what Christ's authoritative message really is." Among the chapters are, "The recognition of Christ as the Incarnate Son;" "Christ's authority on individual duty;" "Christianity and the State;" "The Incarnation and the Holy Spirit." $2.00.

until it has made its march around the world.

I do not hesitate to make a prediction, though I claim no prophetic sight. I judge simply from the facts of history. That prediction is, that some are now living who will see missionaries from the far East visiting our own America to teach us esoteric Christianity. Our present Christianity is largely objective. This may be necessary in order to break down the outer conditions of paganism, the false gods, the unjust laws, etc., etc., but when our western Christianity has done its work on the eastern mind and heart, may it not be that these eastern converts will bring to us a more spiritual and consecrated Christian life to be imitated?

From the premises which I have now suggested, I draw the conclusion that the Disciples of Christ have laid upon them a spiritual obligation to carry the gospel on toward the West until it reaches its final starting place. In the facts already stated, do we not find a new meaning for the religious movement in which we are engaged? The Campbells came from the East to this country, which lies between that part of the world where Christianity was first proclaimed and that portion where it has never yet held any decided sway. In this middle land—this great America of ours—a new movement was inaugurated which proposed to unloose the fetters with which Christianity had been bound, and give it free course, that it might run and be glorified. It is this old gospel in its new environment that must be taken across the Pacific to the old countries that lie west of us, if these countries are ever brought under the influence of the King of kings and Lord of lords. This gospel carries with it the additional plea that all of the disciples of Christ may be one as Christ and his Father are one. In these principles we see our ultimate triumph.

LITERATURE OF TO-DAY

Two Christmas Gift Books.

POEMS AND SONGS. By Thomas Curtis Clark. Christian Publishing Company. Price $1.

Within a few days a new book will be issued from the presses of the Christian Publishing Company, and we are sure that it will be warmly welcomed. It will be a simple little volume of poems and songs by a writer who has become known to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the many helpful contributions that have appeared in these columns. Mr. Clark has cultivated the muses for some time, and not without, as many competent judges think, success. He is deeply religious, and most of his poems that have been published in periodicals—for he has won a place in other papers than our own—show the religious feeling; but he has cultivated wider fields than that of devotional poetry, and some of these efforts will be found in the little book which is about to be published. "How Far is it to Childhood Town?" is one that we feel sure will be received with special delight, while "The Island of Dreams" has a rhythm that stays with one. We can not, in this brief notice, attempt to mention other of the poems, but bespeak a cordial reception of the little volume at the hands of our readers. It will make a delightful Christmas present, and will be printed from hand-set type on laid paper, with blue silk cloth binding and special cover design in gold.

Mr. Clark is the son of T. J. Clark, pastor of the church at Bloomington, Ind. He is the composer of a number of songs, secular and sacred, among them being "Somewhere," published by Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. His latest song, "Shine On, Oh Star," was recently accepted for publication by Theodore Bendix, of New York. Mr. Clark is the leader of the Junior Bible Class of the First Christian Church, St. Louis, Mo.

AT SEVENTY-FIVE, AND OTHER POEMS. No more beautiful Christmas present, nor one more acceptable to his friends could be given than the handsome volume of poems of Dr. W. T. Moore. These have very high literary merit, and as a birthday souvenir of the distinguished writer in themselves they will appeal to many. The beautiful form in which they are presented has led critics to say that no handsomer volume has been put out by any publishing house in the West. The book is printed in three colors on the finest hand-made paper, and contains several illustrations of Dr. Moore, the first one picturing him at the age of 18, beardless; another one being a striking likeness of him at the present time. The book, which has been issued as a birthday souvenir, is by special arrangement, sold by us for two dollars.

Books for Young People.

WHAT HAPPENED TO BARBARA. By Olive Thorne Miller. pp. 301. Price $1.25. Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

"It is a 'dandy'," was the not elegant but thoroughly understood comment of a young girl after reading a few chapters of this book. The story is one that holds the interest thoroughly of the girl in the early 'teens.

NINA'S CAREER. By Christina Gowans Whyte. pp. 314. Price $1.50. The Macmillan Co.

There are many characters, plenty of incident, and enough of the love element to make this a really delightful book for budding womanhood. Entirely wholesome, it is both strongly natural and interesting to the last page.

Any book reviewed in these columns (except "net" books) will be sent postpaid by The Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis, on receipt of the published price. For "net" books, add ten per cent for postage.

"STORIES FROM CHAUCER." By J. Walker McSpadden. "Stories from Morris." By Madalen Edgar. "Stories of Early England." By E. M. Wilmot-Buxton. Price 60 cents each volume. Thomas Y. Crowell Company.

These little books are of uniform edition and are intended to bring to young people some of the gems of early English literature. They answer well this purpose, for the language is within the grasp of young minds and the selections are of a character to interest. The stories of early England, as sung by bards and minstrels, are arranged in chronological order, taking us up to the fifteenth century. Each volume contains a preface and there are many illustrations.

In Magazine Land.

ST. NICHOLAS entered upon its thirty-fifth volume with the November number.

A magazine that has lived so long and won such success hardly needs commendation, for these facts speak its value. But there are doubtless many homes into which it has never gone and we may at once say this illustrated magazine for boys and girls would bring to these pleasure and instruction. For the distinguishing characteristic of the St. Nicholas monthly bill of fare is that it hath in it profit as well as entertainment. It is the young folks' magazine. The new volume is to contain a new serial story by Ralph Henry Barbour, who has won great popularity among young readers, while as attractive as any serial will be the "true story" serial entitled, "Three Years Behind the Guns," being the record of the daily life and experience of a boy who ran away to sea and became a "jackie." Specially for girls is a story by Mrs. A. McClelland Daulton, for which is predicted greater success than anything she has yet written. Gen. O. O. Howard will tell some of the romance of Indian life. Mrs. Burnett and Carolyn Wells are to write and there are to be many short stories and descriptive papers. The 'St. Nicholas League" is a very popular department and this will be improved.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE. This, one of our premier periodicals, began its seventy-fifth volume with the October issue. Mrs. Burnett's "The Shuttle," is concluded in the Christmas number, which is one of the best issues the editors of the "Century" have ever put together. "A Visit to the Paris Conservatoire" is an illuminating sketch, and "New Photographs of Mars" is another special article. One of the "feature" contributions to this new volume is the series of reminiscences of Lady Randolph Churchill. This brilliant American woman had through her marriage with the distinguished British nobleman unusual opportunities and in the December installment tells of English social traits and life at Blenheim. There are a number of excellent stories, besides some special Christmas matter and poems. A representation of Ivanowski's painting of Emma Eames as "Aida" is one of the striking illustrations.

THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS. It would be difficult to find anywhere a better resume of the world's happenings than is presented twelve times a year in this periodical. One of its strong points is that it illustrates the news features of the world, both by ordinary photographs and select cartoons. In the December number are a number of articles on the financial crisis. "American Painting To-day" illustrates well present tendencies. A very delightful contribution is that of Jeannette L. Gilder on "Queen Victoria." Especially topical is an article on "How Germany Makes Toys for the World's Christmas." A periodical of this kind can not schedule in advance many contributions for its next year's issue, but we may feel confident that under the editorship of Dr. Albert Shaw there will be no lessening of the value to the busy man of the "Review of Reviews."

THE DELINEATOR.— The Christmas number contains many contributions that appeal to the women and children of our homes. Edwin Markham says that this holiday recalls to us the fact that we have a larger and nobler nature. Eva Booth, who came to this world with the snowflakes on one Christmas Day, thinks this is the brightest of all the days in the year. It was on the same day, seven years after her own birthday, that she gave herself as a Christmas present to Jesus Christ. Charles F. Aked finds the charm of Christmas in the fact that the entire Christian world stands around the cradle of a child. The meaning of Christmas to him is nothing less than peace on earth. Among the other special Christmas features are "Christmas in Strange Places," a story, "Not as the World Giveth" by Zona Gale, "How Santa Claus Comes to the Children of the Rich," and "The Best Christmas I Ever Had," consisting of real stories of Yule-tide happiness. The regular features of the magazine are continued, and a special article appears about the campaign which this periodical has entered upon in behalf of child rescue.

PUTNAM'S MONTHLY has a very attractive cover design for its Christmas number, while its frontispiece is an excellent reproduction of the Sistine Madonna from a color printing by Hapfstaengl. This is in accord with the leading article, whose subject is "Painting and the Word." We can commend this article to all interested in religious art. There are eight reproductions from photographs of pictures illustrating the life of Christ, most of which are well known to travelers, but have not had any wide publicity through periodical literature. There is an appreciation, apropos of the poet's centenary, of John Greenleaf Whittier, by H. W. Boynton. Brander Matthews writes on "Recollections of the Rabelais Club," and there are published some more Longfellow letters. We cannot stop to enumerate other interesting contributions, but taking a glance at the new volume we may state that among the contents for 1908 we are promised some very interesting and valuable material. Mr. Henry Holt is to contribute a series of papers describing his visit to the West. There will be illustrated art papers. "How London Is Governed" is to be told by the clerk of the London County Council." The Chief of our Forest Service is preparing a paper dealing with the attempt now being made to strike a balance between the production and consumption of timber in the United States. Art and Literature will, of course, be the strong feature of this magazine, but there will be essays on the "American Diplomatic Service," "Napoleon's Return from St. Helena," "Washington as a Colonial Magnate," while in the January number some Japanese statesmen of to-day are to be sketched by W. G. Fitzgerald.

NEWS FROM MANY FIELDS

The Scoville Meetings at Lincoln.

I am aware that many things have been written concerning the great evangelistic successes of Charles Reign Scoville in recent years, and that his greatest meeting, just closed at Lincoln, Neb., has already been ably reported by the special correspondent of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The eyes of the brotherhood have watched the frequent reports telegraphed to our papers week by week. It would seem that enough had been written. Yet perhaps a few paragraphs from the pen of one associated as a co-worker may not be amiss. They will at least afford an opportunity to make a merited expression of appreciation of his great work in our midst.

The meetings were remarkable because of the great difficulties encountered. Lincoln is a delightful home city. Its air of culture is, in many ways, ideal. It is not a wicked city as cities go. But as the seat of a great state university with its agnostic atmosphere, added to the conservatism of culture it has been exceedingly difficult to move religiously. In nearly twenty years of observation of its social life I have never seen a great or general religious awakening, although repeated evangelistic efforts have been made. The results of the meetings are a matter of surprise on every hand. On the last Sunday the city press was filled with words of appreciation from prominent members, ministers and laymen, of nearly every religious body in the city. The results were far more than that shown by numbers. The enthusiasm and awakening extended widely throughout the state and stimulated interest in other meetings, and will doubtless continue to do so.

Much, it must be said, depended upon the organization and preparation made for the meeting, under the direction of the evangelist. As the writer had little to do with this he may well give large praise to the skill in advertising and the enterprise in planning, both before and during the meetings. Another significant element of power lay in the joining of all our local churches into a united body for the time with a common end. It seemed during the meeting that all special interests were lost sight of, and, since its close, that the brotherhood, meeting in the four church centers, is one church in sympathy and aim. This alone is worth the outlay and effort.

In writing of the evangelists there is danger that reference to them may become mere eulogy. It is only natural that they should gather to themselves strong friendship, and that they should be accorded high praise. But certainly nothing could be more distasteful to them than empty compliment. They are men and women with mistakes and faults as others who labor in like fields. But it would be less than justice not to highly commend their work and ability. The simple truth is that Brother Scoville is a man of masterly platform power. I have never seen men more profoundly moved than in his men's meetings. He is a master of assemblies as few men can be. He is fluent of speech, intensely earnest, inspirational in the use of wit and pathos, and above all believes in his mission and his message. His spirit is one of kindness for men and women, but of uncompromising denunciation of sin. He is loyal to his convictions. He wasted no words in negative teaching, but presented the simple apostolic plea without apology or compromise. The scriptures were to him an end of controversy. He made much of prayer and gave evidence of communings with God in preparation for his public message. Some of his plans and methods are different from those of our general practice. Some of the practices of other evangelists outside of our ranks were adopted with marked success. He is original and abounds in surprises. No two services are just alike. Yet he does not convey the impression of being intentionally sensational.

In nothing does Scoville show more wisdom than in the selection of his associates. Brothers Smith and Van Camp are eloquent in song and great leaders of assemblies. The power of personal work was greatly emphasized. Much of the fruits of the meeting were "hand-picked," ripened, first, by strong and fervent preaching. I am sure that it is the unanimous judgment of those best able to know that a great and far-reaching impetus has been given to the cause of apostolic Christianity in Lincoln and far beyond its limits.

It brings new responsibilities and cares but opens wide the doors of opportunity.

We thank God and take courage.

W. P. Aylsworth.

The Belleville (Kan.) Meeting.

This meeting was one of the greatest ever held in this part of the state. Belleville is a city with a population of about 2,500. The Central Christian Church had a resident membership of 258, and a nonresident membership of 92 on June 30. The Bible school averaged about 130 before the meeting. But during the meeting the attendance never fell below 250 and reached as high as 309.

We decided last January to call Evangelist Fife and his son for a meeting in October, and began to prepare for the same by booming the Bible school, the Y. P. S. C. E. and other departments of the church. Besides we began to train a large chorus for the meeting. And we talked it from the pulpit, on the streets, in the homes, in business places, and everywhere we could until everybody was expecting something great. When the time came for advertising we did that on a big scale. And when the evangelists arrived the chorus met them at the train singing "The King's Business." This attracted the attention of the railroad men as well as others. We had some promised for the first invitation and as a result 16 came the first day. The interest continued during the entire meeting of four and one-half weeks.

November 24, the closing day, was the greatest day this town ever experienced. The Bible school numbered 257 in attendance. In the afternoon the house was again crowded for the good fellowship meeting. This was the zenith of the meeting. The new members were seated in the auditorium and filled about two-thirds of it. When lined up for the hand of fellowship the line extended around the inside of the house. Then the members of the church surprised my wife and myself with a thankoffering of $79, and then raised my salary $200 per year. The evening service was a splendid service and people were turned away that could not get in. The total number that came into the church was 130. Of these 100 were baptized.

Evangelist Fife and son preach and sing the gospel. They help the pastor as the people and cause them to think more of him. Brother Fife is a rustler in personal work, and a general in organization. Brother Clyde is a splendid chorus leader, a good soloist and a fine preacher, as well as an adept at personal work.

They went from here to Greeley, Colo., to hold a meeting. They were to have gone to Savannah, Mo., but that church became frightened at the financial depression and cancelled the date. We had the same scare here but it did not hurt us. We not only raised enough for the meeting but have over $100 left in the treasury for other work. We now have one of the strongest and best churches in Northern Kansas, west of Atchison.

R. C. Harding, pastor.

Meeting at Ensley, Ala.

S. P. Spiegel, state evangelist, is assisting P. H. Duncan in a meeting at Ensley. The meeting began under good auspices, the audiences being most favorably impressed with Brother Spiegel's preaching. The meetings will continue indefinitely, and we hope with substantial and gratifying results. Brother Spiegel has held some of the greatest meetings ever held in Alabama. In fact, so far as we recall, he had the largest number of additions at East Tallassee—126. Brother Duncan is also a preacher of ability and experience. He is an indefatigable worker and we confidently look for great results in this meeting.

Ensley is a suburb of Birmingham and the site of the largest steel plants in the South. In this rapidly growing city the possibilities for building up a strong church are unlimited.

Editor of Children's Day Exercise and Sunday-school lesson notes for Foreign Christian Missionary Society, and former State evangelist of Kentucky.

Men's Work in New York State.

The Men's League, connected with some of the churches of the Empire State, are becoming a noticeable factor in their local church interests and of no insignificant force in advancing the cause of state missions. The Men's League of the Rowland Street Church, Syracuse, N. Y., gave a reception recently to the league of the Central and the Auburn churches, at which some sixty men were present. It was a unique affair in that the meeting was held in the bakery of John Ramsey, a member of the Rowland Street Church, and while seated at the tables biscuits and cakes were served hot from the ovens; hence we might consider it a warm reception. Dr. Eli H. Long, of Buffalo, president of the New York Christian Missionary Society, and the sponsor of the leagues, was unexpectedly present, and when he entered the room in company of the writer and James A. Serena, of the Central Church, he was greeted with an ovation. C. H. Curry, president of the local league, presided and after a brief business session, C. Roy Stauffer, minister of the local church, was made master of ceremonies. Dr. Long gave a very entertaining talk upon the missionary interests in the state, and recited some facts and figures showing marked increase in state day receipts. Arthur Braden, minister of the Auburn Church, the scheduled speaker of the evening, selected as the theme for his address, "Christian Man," and said, "Too much emphasis has been and is yet placed upon the money feature in our campaign for righteousness, and too little upon the man. We want," he said, "consecrated Christian men. A billion dollars would avail nothing without consecrated men, but with consecrated men the cause would prosper and the money question would be solved. Brother Serena, minister of the Central Church, gave a "snap shot" picture of the Norfolk convention with the fine touch of the artist. C. G. Van Wormer, vice-president of our State League, briefly recalled what he had gleaned at the convention, relating to men's organizations in the brotherhood and appeals made in the several addresses for greater activites in our churches on the part of our men. Dr. A. G. Foust, president of the State League, who was also present at the convention, touched upon some things he saw and heard, and then outlined a prospective work for individual men as well as leagues to engage in throughout the state.

Other impromptu speakers were Brethren Noble and Goodrich, of the Auburn Church, and E. A. Olley, secretary of the State League, who introduced some correspondence received from a men's league in Wilmington, O., and related some personal experiences.

The men at Auburn have a strong organization and have opened a mission Sunday-school with the view of building a second congregation. The Rowland Street Church, of Syracuse, also is fortunate in having a strong organization of men and under the strenuous leadership of Brother Stauffer are planning for the purchase of a lot and the erection of a new building in the near future. The Central Church has under consideration a Bible school campaign this winter. As a matter of information and common interest the secretary of the men's league of the Church of Christ in the state of New York, invites your correspondence. Address E. A. Olley, secretary, 310 Elliott street, Syracuse, N. Y.

T. S. Frost, of Varnsville, S. C., takes the work at Spray, N. C. We are glad to have Brother Frost locate in our part of the state. Spray has been for several months without a preacher.——The headquarters of A. B. Cunningham, president, and W. G. Walker, corresponding secretary, of the state board, is changed from Washington, N. C., (not D. C., as printed recently in my notes), to Wilson, N. C., where the office of the "Carolina Evangelist" will be located.——C. L. Andrew held a meeting for Galatia.——We hope the splendid achievements of the past year, as reported at our state convention, will give an impetus to our state work that will continue all through our present year.——The Tarboro hospital, mentioned in my last notes, is worth $15,000, not $1,500.——The little band of Disciples at Fremont are progressing nicely with their house of worship and expect to soon have the best church in the town. It will seat 300.——Your correspondent has been called to Bellaire, O., to visit his mother, who is very ill. Her father, Joseph Nelson, was first to invite the Campbells to preach at Bellaire, and her mother was the first convert after a work was started at that place.——J. H. McCall, a member of the Winston-Salem Church, but residing at Greensboro, died November 9. He was at one time a deacon at Central Church, Lexington, Ky. He was highly esteemed. J. A. Hopkins.

Pastor Holds Meeting at Rushville, Ind.

Seventy-two added—40 by confession and baptism—was the visible result of our three-weeks' meeting which we began immediately after the Norfolk convention. Frank M. Charlton was with us as leader of song and I did the preaching. Brother Charlton is an exceptionally good soloist and chorus leader and did us much good. The meeting closed with great enthusiasm, 22 coming forward on the last invitation. We should have continued longer but for physical reasons. This makes about 150 added to this congregation thus far this year, W. W. Sniff having had about 60 additions the last month of his pastorate. We are enjoying our work at Rushville greatly. They are royal people here, full of the spirit of aggressiveness. The church is supporting Brother McDougal at Calcutta, India, and Brother Wolfe at Manilla, Philippine Islands. The outlook is bright with promise.

R. W. Abberley, Minister.

For 34 Consecutive Years

Select Notes edited by F. N. Peloubet, D.D., and Amos R. Wells, M.A., have furnished inspiration, instruction, and information found in no other publication. Each year it keeps in touch with all that is new and helpful in religious literature and thought, presenting it in a concise and practical form to its students.

A new feature of this year's volume is the use of a large number of suggestive questions with answers, interwoven into the explanatory material, just as they would naturally be used in the teaching of the lessons; this will be most helpful to teachers in bringing out new thoughts for discussion in the class.

Christmas Lesson.—Matt. 2.1-12.

Memory verses, 10-12.

GOLDEN TEXT.—For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.—Luke 2:11.

The familiar words of this chapter—"Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the King," and so on—are like music to our ears. The stupendous theme, the simple language, the familiar rhythm of the sentences, the holy memories which they summon, all contribute to an effect which appeals alike to the senses and to the reason.

Even the most thoughtless person feels that this is a record of a momentous affair. Here is the supreme moment of history. No night was ever so crowded with meaning and value for the human race as that night "when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the king." In the centuries before that, the world had but proved its impotence and exhibited its utter inability to prosper, either materially or spiritually, without those principles which Jesus brought.

He came, the embodiment of the truth of God, the incarnation of God's love and peace and patience. These qualities had been in the world before, but feebly. Men had seen, but darkly as in a warped mirror, those divine qualities which it is the will of God that men should incorporate into their lives. The truth had been told to them, but it had not been shown to them in human form. At this time, on this day of the birth of Jesus, there entered into the world the most potent manifestation of those truths, the most convincing argument for righteousness and love. This was the greatest formative force that ever entered into individual life or human history. It is proper that we should date all events from the birth of life.

The birth of Christ in the world is of avail only as he is born afresh in the hearts of individual men. To be sure, the regeneration of society and the uplift of the race which has come through the influence of Christ in the world during all these Christian centuries, brings a heritage of blessing in which all men share, even those who personally reject the source of all those blessings. But this is only an incidental and relatively small benefit. The true blessing comes only to those for whom the birth of Christ is not only a fact in history nineteen centuries ago, but a present and vital fact in their own experience.

F. Zacharias' Song.	Luke 1:68-79.
S. Simeon's Song.	Luke 2:29-35.
S. Topic.

In preparation for this very beautiful lesson one should read the whole of the first and second chapters of Luke. Read thoughtfully and more than once, and ponder the narrative to enter as far as possible into the spirit of the time.

Think of Mary, frightened by the sudden appearance of the angel and disturbed by his announcement. Think of the exaltation of soul as she gradually realized that the age-long hopes of Israel were to be fulfilled and that she was to be the mother of the great Lord of Glory.

Read over her song of praise thoughtfully. How humble and grateful, yet how grand.

At this happy Christmas season can you not make it your own? Can you not read it aloud as your own song of praise? Try it.

Which one of Mary's phrases will you use in the Christian Endeavor meeting as the expression of your praise? Will you say, "My soul doth magnify the Lord and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour"? Some disciples' lives belittle the Lord. How about yours?

Can you say in the next meeting, "He hath regarded my low estate"? How hopeless we were before the coming of Christ our Saviour. His Christmas gift to the world was his power to lift us up.

Can you say in return, "All generations shall call me blessed"? Your life may be an eternal spring of everflowing blessing through the influences you inaugurate. Are you thus making your present life fruitful with blessings for the future?

Will you voice your testimony in the words of the forty-ninth verse? "He that is mighty hath done to me great things; and holy is his name." Do you often meditate upon the great things that are in your life because of the life and work of Jesus? And all his power is for your upbuilding in holiness, into participance with his divine nature.

Have you had refuge in "his mercy" because you have feared him? Has he "showed you strength with his arm," and scattered proud adversaries before you? Has he "exalted you" out of the depths from which you cried? Has he raised you to sit with him at his right hand in heavenly places?

Has he filled you "with good things"? Have you tested and seen that the Lord is good"? And are you conscious that he is keeping with you the "covenant"? This song of Mary may be your praise. And your praise is fitting acknowledgement of what the coming of Jesus into the world means to you.

Think over the lesson and decide which of these praises of Mary you will make your own for the coming meeting.

Midweek Prayer-Meeting

By Charles Blanchard.

The Greatest Grace.

Topic, December 18.—1 Cor., chapter 13.

"And the greatest of these is Love." It is the language of the Great Apostle. But the Spirit of the Christ inspired its utterance. There is no accounting for it in any other rational way. Some one has said that the conversion of Saul of Tarsus is the strongest possible evidence of the divine origin of the religion of Jesus Christ. The greatest of all the miracles of grace is this turning of Saul, who persecuted the church, into the mightiest missionary of the cross of Christ. The Apostle to the Gentiles is a perpetual challenge to the infidelity of the world and a convincing proof of the faith which he once sought to destroy, but afterwards preached with such glorious self-abandon that his name to-day is everywhere recognized as the very greatest in the records of redeeming grace.

And it was this man who wrote the most wonderful chapter in the Bible, or in the literature of the world. He is not called the "Apostle of Love." That honor is given to the beloved John, the disciple who leaned on the Master's breast and who has revealed most the heart of the Christ to men. Yet it was given to Paul, who was in labors more abundant than all the other apostles, and who, in the midst of manifold perils, was cumbered with the care of all the churches, to write this perfect prose-poem of Love. Out of his blessedly busy life sprang the perfect flower of the Master's love in his own life, this simple and sublime utterance, this final and full utterance on the greatest of all themes. How do you account for it? There is no accounting for it on any other theory than that he received it from the Lord. You seek a proof of the inspiration of the New Testament? Find it in this thirteenth chapter of 1 Corinthians. And seek no further. Here where the scoffer is silenced the soul may rest. Don't be afraid that the old Book is going to fail us. The volume that contains the sermon on the mount, the Lord's prayer, the thirteenth and fifteenth chapters of 1 Corinthians, is not a disappearing volume. "Will the Old Book stand?" Let your heart answer. Yes, while the world stands and Love lasts.

"And now abideth faith, hope, love; but the greatest of these is love." Love is great because it abides. But love is great for other and blessed reasons. Love is great for what it does and for what it does not do. And according to this chapter, love is greatest for what it does not do. The virtues that we sometimes call negative are just the qualities that mark the perfection of love. "Love suffereth long and is kind. Love is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil, is not puffed up; doth not behave herself unseemly; seeketh not her own. Love believeth all things, hopeth all things and never faileth." Ah, yes; "endureth all things"—I forgot that. But it is just this quality of endurance that marks the perfect character of love. Endurance—not stoical self-possession, with face of flint and heart of stone, hopeless, yet possessed of stubborn defiance; but endurance with patience, warmed with human kindness and tendered with gentlest sympathies, while life is filled with gracious ministries. This is the love of the Christ and of the great apostle. Where did he learn it? Where but in prison, or while bearing his heavy burdens on those long and weary journeys that brought the gospel into Europe and made us debtors to Paul, as he felt himself debtor both to Jews and to Gentiles. It was love that fired his spirit with a lofty purpose and divine determination to preach the gospel to them in Rome also. Love is no weak-kneed, knocked-kneed makeshift of a man, or silly, simpering something mis-named a woman. Such know not what love means.

How few of us really know the meaning of this little word. Fewer of us know the might of the thing itself. I am confessing my own unworthiness. I have sung of Love, who am not worthy of the least of all his mercies and his loving-kindness. Yet my soul has caught a glimpse of the Christ, whose holiest name is Love. He came forth from the Father and the Father sent him. He is one with the Father. And God is Love. I am slow of heart to understand, but I am trying to spell it out. I want to spell it in my own life, as I try to read it in the lives of others. And this is Love's way. I am glad it is so. The humble and the lowly may know the secret of its might, the marvel of its transforming power, the triumphs of its grace working out in our human lives. And it is Love makes us great.

You are ALL CONFUSED about Pianos!

—You want the sweetest toned
—You want that sweet tone to last
—You dislike to spend any more money than necessary:—But every adviser, and so-called expert, recommends a different make. You are like a man lost in the woods. You don't know which way to turn. This surely describes your position.

℞ THE REMEDY:—Educate yourself on the subject! Study—read—Read more—Study more. Then listen in the quietness of your own parlor to the tone of the highest grade piano you can get, but without agreeing to purchase it. Call in all those musical friends who you know are not under past obligations to any piano dealers or friends of dealers. Resolve you will study attentively piano tone and will be deaf, while studying, to the magnetic talk and persuasiveness of salesmen. This is the intelligent way. It's the way you planned your new home. You made a long study of it calmly, thoroughly, and you became quite an expert. You can be just as expert about pianos.

NEW YORK

You may send me the "Book of Complete Information" and the "Story Book" but without any cost to me or obligation on my part.

We are willing to send you free two books:

One officially entitled "The Book of Complete Information about Pianos."

YOU NEED THIS BOOK of 156 Pages handsomely bound, if you ever intend to buy a piano, no matter what make.

It tells how to test a piano and how to tell good from bad; what causes pianos to get out of order. It makes the selection of a piano easy. If read carefully it will make you an expert judge of piano-tone, of action, workmanship and of durability.

It tells everything that any one can possibly want to know about pianos; gives a description of every part of the piano, how put together and all the processes of manufacture. Gives description of the new invention for aiding learners to play called THE NOTEACCORD (endorsed by Paderewski and other great pianists). It explains Agents and Dealers' Methods and Devices.

It tells about the very first piano; the qualities of labor, the felt, ivories and woods used in every high-grade piano and compares high qualities with the cheaper kind (used in inferior pianos). Describes what constitutes a musical-piano-tone, and in fact is a complete encyclopedia.

You need and should have THIS EDUCATIONAL BOOK to thoroughly inform you whenever CONFUSED ABOUT PIANOS.

Its scores of illustrations (all devoted to piano construction) are not only interesting but are instructive; to children as well as to adults.

You will certainly learn a great deal about pianos that you could not hear of or read ANYWHERE ELSE, for it is absolutely the only book of its kind ever published. Nevertheless we send it free.

The other book is also copyrighted but is a short story named "JOHN HONEYWELL'S REASONS." The story of an average American family which was ALL CONFUSED about Pianos—it is interesting, readable and prettily illustrated—gives a little hint of a love affair which the piano helped along, as many pianos have done.

These two books cost quite a sum to produce, print, bind, illustrate and mail. Upwards of 400,000 have been issued and without a single exception have been highly commended.

SO FAR not one word about ourselves. We are and have been the manufacturers of THE FAMOUS WING PIANO for the past 39 years!

We have supplied over 40,000 American Homes with WING PIANOS.

We refer to Banks, Governors of many States and Judges; to Merchants, Conservatories of Music, Singers and Professors of Music. We have been students of vibration and of musical tone and strength of materials during all these 39 years. The first patent issued to our Mr. Wing, Senior, for improvement on pianos was in 1876 and other improvements have been invented since at the average rate of more than one yearly. These facts prove our skill and long experience, but would not be mentioned if we did not wish to show you that we know the piano subject as few others have had the opportunity; for 39 years is a long—long time for a business house to "live and learn" and constantly prosper.

Write for the books at once or fill in the coupon. Take it out and mail to us now while you think of it (and while you have the coupon). You will be under no obligations whatever.

The Master Chord.

BY METTIE CRANE NEWTON.

He speaks! His words, like stars, diffuse the light
And love of upper worlds: his presence like
The breath of spring, enflow'rs and vivifies.
Ah What and whence the power that gives to words
The master-chord that thrills and fills and feeds
The soul; to character and life, the true
Nobility? Intellect? Nay. The force
Of mind and will? Ah, nay. A sunless world
Would have the charm of majesty and might;
Mountains and hills would rear their stately forms
Unto the heavens; rivers flow onward
To the sea:—sublimely grand, ay, grand, but cold.

But see! In the orient sky rises the sun,
And Nature's face, transfigured in her smile,
Smiles upward to the skies. The forces hid
Within her breast, quickened by light and warmth,
Send forth the bud and bloom on vale and hill,
And wakens melodies that softly steal
Into the secret places of the soul,
Like the sweet airs of angel-lutes. And thus
In lives touched by celestial fires, blossoms
A new, sweet life, that greatens and sublimes
The soul; fires genius; tunes the heart to song;
And gives to words the master power that wins
The world, thro' night and sin, to light and God.

New York.

A little London girl won a prize at a flower show. Her prize was grown in an old cracked teapot in the rear window of the attic in a tenement house. When asked how she continued to grow so perfect a flower in such surroundings, she said she always moved it around to wherever there was a sunbeam. Perhaps that would be a pretty good receipt for anybody's growth in some directions. We're all a good deal like plants. The hymn "Walk in the Light," means live in the light. Walking is the Bible phrase for living.—Rev. W. T. Richardson, Ph. D.

Old Acquaintances.

Among the visitors in New York from the South, during the centennial celebration, was a gentleman on the staff of the governor of Virginia. He had written to a friend to engage a horse for him to ride during his stay in New York. A white horse, proud-stepping and slender-limbed, was selected, and on the morning appointed was led in company with a coal-black steed, to the spot where the Virginia gentleman and a friend were ready to mount, when, lo, the black horse pawed the ground, shook his head, showed great uneasiness, and altogether behaved so remarkably that he attracted great attention.

"As sure as I live," said the rider of the white steed to his companion. "You are mounted on Black Diamond, my own old horse!"

"Nonsense!" said the other equestrian. "You wouldn't know Black Diamond now, and he wouldn't know you."

By this time a little throng of spectators had gathered, interested in the scene. Black Diamond's saddle was taken off, and under it was discovered an old scar and a little tuft of white hair, which proved his identity beyond a doubt. When his old master mounted him, the horse fairly quivered with delight, and gave a cry of gladness. All through the centennial week there were two happy beings together, a man and a horse; and a horse sometimes shows intelligence so nearly human that one cannot but be glad when a great pleasure falls into the life of this faithful friend of man.

Peter at the 'Phone.

"I left my dog accidently at a friend's house yesterday," said a young girl, as reported in the Philadelphia "Evening Bulletin." "My friend tried to get him to run after me, but he would not leave. He plainly held that I would soon return; that since I had gone without him I would come back inevitably for him, and he stuck to the room where I had parted from him, feeling that it was his duty to do so. Finally my friend called me up on the telephone.

"'Your dog won't go,' she said. 'He thinks you will be back, and we can't drive him out.'

"'Hold him up to the 'phone,' said I.

"She held him up.

"'Peter,' said I, 'come home; I am waiting at home for you. Come straight home, Peter, good little dog.'

"Peter wagged his tail, wiggled down and out of my friend's arms and set off homeward like a flash of lightning."

The Lion's Tooth.

Who could guess that the dandelion was the dent de lion, or lion's tooth—and the tulip so called because it looks like a turban, and that tulip was another name for turban? The beautiful gladiolus is a sword lily: gladiolus (Latin) means "a little sword." It is so called from the shape of its leaves. The asphodel is from the Greek word meaning "king's spear." The name daffodil comes from "asphodel," and so means the same thing.

"How can you tell an old fowl from a young one?"

"By the teeth."

"But fowls have none."

All Play and No Work.

"All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy," says a queer old proverb, and it is quite as true of Jack's sister. That is why there are so many pleasant breaks in your school work. Before you have had time to get really tired, recess begins, and if your teacher sees you are all getting dull and sleepy, she reads you a funny story, or sets you to doing gymnastics to wake you up. Then every week comes Saturday with its fun. There is enough play sprinkled in with your work to keep you from becoming dull girls and boys.

But all play and no work is nearly as bad as all work and no play. The girls and boys who do nothing but romp and play all summer, really grow tired of it. They are likely to be fretful and restless, and it is very hard to start work again in the fall. Try helping mother a little bit every day, and see if that does not make a pleasant change. You will have all the better time for doing something useful. All play and no work is likely to make Jack a lazy or a selfish boy.

Worth Keeping.

We know a man in a very trying position with many trying duties to do, very few encouragements and many perplexing problems on his hands. During the year 1906 he had pinned on his desk some encouraging lines. He was about to throw them away when we rescued them and passed them on in the hope that they may prove helpful.

"Keep going." There are no more cowardly words than "give up."

"Keep your head." Train your thoughts as soldiers are trained, not to fly into a panic and scatter helplessly in the hour of peril, but be firm, alert, and ready.

"Keep clean." Let no seeming obstacle persuade you that your path must diverge, even for a few steps, into the mire. There is a clean way to everything worth having.

"Keep faith." Above all, keep faith; faith in the Fatherhood of God, the loving presence of Christ, the rule of God, and the triumph of right.—Sailors' Magazine.

CLOTHING THE LORD IN PATCHES

BY KATHERINE ELISE CHAPMAN.

Luella Eliza was elderly, lonely and poor. She had been left hanging, a russet leaf, upon the bough from which all her own kin had fallen. She was thinking of this—and of them—that morning when, waking, she remembered that it was her birthday, and that she was fifty-four years old. Upon the chair beside her bed lay a heap of warm, woolen clothing. As she glanced at it, the tears started into her eyes. The clothes had been her mother's, and until to-day they had been kept too sacred for any uses except reverent touches and the tears of a regretful memory; but now a crisis had come, and they must needs be taken from their chest.

Her short breakfast, and that of Felicity being dispatched, she took into her lap a smaller, badly-worn pile of her own.

"This'll have to go," she said of one garment after another; "the rag-bag's gapin' for 'em; but this—les-s-s see—elbows worn bad, but by patchin' it'll last another winter. Old Mis' Andrews 'ez got the rheumatism in er joints. Will it be good enough for her?"—holding it out critically and turning it around—"Yes, with a good patch or two, it'll be warmer than now."

She went on, sorting and selecting, assigning most of the garments to the piece-bag, and others to her Little Sisters among the Poor. This Michigan town, originally settled from New England, was severely cold in winter. Much of the life-blood had seemingly throbbed away to larger cities; so that there was often need of a helping hand among the aged and unfortunate.

At last, she turned to the larger pile in front of her. A gush of tears came.

"Oh, mother!" she sobbed, "if you knew, you wouldn't blame me for takin' out your clo'es to wear. I ain't had work for a month, and I've lived on corn mush mostly, and a few beans because they was cheap"—she shivered a little although hot tears were falling—"and my clo'es ez most worn out, and it's cold."

At length she dried her eyes.

"I ain't missed a winter," she thought, "but what I had something for the Ladies' Aid, and ole Mis' Andrews, anyway. Them I always helped; but this time it'll be nothin' but clothes, and poor ones at that; I'll have to wear Mother's. I jess couldn't give 'em away." She wiped her eyes again. "I'll jess flax 'round, now, and tidy up," she was speaking aloud again, this time to Felicity, the cat, "and then I'll set down and do the mendin'. I'm thankful I don't have to find you in clo'es, Lissy, ain't you? It's the Lord himself who looks after you."

Luella Eliza did not take much time to tidy up. After the wax flowers on the dingy mantel-piece had been carefully adjusted, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress and the photograph album placed at just the right angle to the family Bible on the center-table, and the bright rag rug before the stove shaken out, she was ready to begin her labors.

Her scissors snipped and flew, and her needle did marvels that morning. Her friends were used to remark of Luella that "she was a right smart hand at fixin' up things," and she had carved out her destiny and moulded the daily bread with her needle. But somehow, of late, ladies were getting to say that her styles were not up to date. Work had fallen off, and she was becoming poorer and lonelier and more sorrowful every day.

She still had one friend, however, who had been faithful. Mrs. Preston had for several years "looked after" Luella Eliza and furnished her with work. The tie between them was a strong one, knit through the faithful, self-devoted nursing once given by Luella to Mrs. Preston's invalid mother. But of late, her friend had been away, and Luella Eliza had keenly felt the difference.

Perhaps she could yet have made ends meet, if it had not been for that mortgage. After her mother had died and the funeral expenses had been met—somehow—there was still the mortgage, left over from the time when the father, expecting in a year or two to pay it all, had died suddenly. Relative and friend had slipped away, but the mortgage still stayed; stayed with the old place itself, which nobody could be persuaded to buy.

But, one day a wonderful piece of good fortune, as she thought it, had come to Luella Eliza. She had found a tenant. Some one, attracted by the size of the old rooms and the cheapness at which Luella Eliza could be persuaded to rent them, had taken all except the "ell" and the coal-shed, which Luella retained for herself.

But alas! it proved to be only the beginning of sorrows. There was plastering and painting and papering; there was vexation and trouble and searchings of heart. For the old pump had to be renewed and the chimneys had to be mended; the rusted gutter pipes dribbled at the joints and must be patched, and the roof which had staunchly withstood so many storms suddenly sprung a leak; so that it was three months before the tenants were satisfied, and at least six before she could make a visible gap in the onslaught of bills. Therefore, Luella Eliza, who hated debt and thought it wicked as heresy, was keeping her old clothes together by constant mending, and was living on corn mush, when one day her tenants gave notice that they had found a "modern house."

Yet this morning, in spite of these reverses, there had crept a certain sense of comfort and of merit into her heart as she thought of ole Mis' Andrews and the lame daughter of the washerwoman, who was to get that patched skirt. She glanced again at the larger pile. Out of these scarcely worn garments of her mother she would still have supplies for herself. She was already reconciled to the thought. She looked back at the clothes she was patching . . .why did that text flash into her mind?

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Unto me?—Was she really preparing this clothing for the Lord?—but it must be so, for he had said so. Somehow, the patches looked more shabby. They grew unseemly, indecorous, shocking.

"No, I can't do it," said Luella Eliza at last, biting off her thread with decision. "I can't do it. I can't dress the Lord in patches."

She took off her glasses and rubbed them energetically. Then she sorted out the two piles again. The patched garments were laid aside for herself. All the best of the others were chosen out and wrapped in paper and then it was to warm up the cold beans and eat her dinner.

It was a glowing heart which Luella Eliza took to the Ladies' Aid Society on the afternoon when she was fifty-four years old. She was giving the Lord her best—yes, she was sure, now, that it was her best; some of the exalted passion of Mary, when she broke the alabaster box of ointment, surged through Luella's being. The glow was still there as she walked home in the early winter twilight. Yet sometimes she shivered, too, for her old jacket was less of a protection than ever to her aging frame, and she had a shame-faced sense that the lining was badly frayed. Her mother's cloak, worn through a careful, tidy winter, was in the package she had taken to the Aid Society. It was as good as new, and oh! so thick and warm! She had sometimes opened the chest and run her fingers lovingly over the soft plush. That was a specially sacred gift. It was to go to no less a person than the wife of a home missionary.

After her light supper (she had managed to save some milk from the night before for Felicity) she adjusted her glasses by the little kerosene lamp, and gave the old cloak a thorough inspection.

"Mebbe I can find silk pieces enough to mend it," she said to Felicity. But an exhaustive search through her piece-bags revealed only disappointing and delusive scraps.

"It needs new lining all through, and I could wad it to make it warmer, Lissy," she said, "but oh, where's the money to come from?"

She shook out her old pocket-book; it had a few pennies—one, two—three; she rubbed her finger under the torn lining—three more; six pennies in all!

"Not enough to buy waddin'," she said.

And then, Luella's heart sank. She was discouraged. The joy which had lightened her footsteps was forgotten. She took off her blurred glasses and sank upon her knees.

"Oh, Jesus!" she sobbed, "I do try, I

ASPIRATION.

By Thomas Curtis Clark.

As yonder tree, though captive to the sod,
Lifts heavenward its head; so do we unto God,
In aspiration fond lift heart and mind,
Captive to earth and circumstance unkind.

do try; but to be so poor—it is hard—hard!"

But who ever went into that gracious Presence and returned despairing? She rose and wiped her eyes.

"Shame on me for bein' so ongrateful! I've got a warm room and plenty of bedclo'es and coal yet in the shed. I've got my health and my hands—and may the Lord help me to see his mercies!"

And then she sank upon her knees again to offer her evening thanksgiving with a quiet heart. In that hour brilliant women, radiant with youth and beauty, were receiving the homage of their admirers; maidens were listening to the stammered declaration which expressed itself, when words failed, in the vibrant tone, the conquering eye. This woman was homely and lonely and poor. No lover had ever knelt at her feet. Unaided by any of the graces and triumphs of life which sweeten womanhood and perfect her charms, she had still achieved unselfishness, tenderness, love. And now, with calm trust, she laid her head upon the pillow and gazed out into the friendly darkness. After awhile, as she gazed, the dim outlines of the stove, the chair, the table, seemed to float away in a soft atmosphere of twilight. Somewhere above in the still, soft gloom, a face grew out of the dimness—and she knew him, as we shall all know him, at his appearing. She lay awhile, wrapped in the perfect peace of tender awe. Then she heard a voice.

"Sister," it said, "thou hast clothed me with thy best; but henceforth, I, too, shall wear these robes of poverty As they have clothed thee, they shall also clothe me, for thou hast become a temple in which I may delight to dwell."

As she spoke, the humble garments upon the chair "glowed as no fuller on earth could white them," and then as she lay, still rapt and motionless she glided into peaceful unconsciousness.

Was it a dream? Luella Eliza did not think so. In the morning she recalled the vision vouchsafed to her—so unworth!—with a heart of tender joy. Now she need not be ashamed of her shabby cloak, nor complain of the bitter, biting wind!

While she was washing the dishes, there came a knock at the door. When she opened it, a hearty-looking countryman stood there.

"Mornin! your barn for rent?"

"The barn? oh, I never thought"—

"Waal, if you want a renter, name yer price; I guess we can fix it up, somehow."

"Oh, I don't know how much"—

"Waal, I 'lowed it was worth two and a half. It's good and large, but shackly in places. I guess I can tinker it up. Will that suit yeh?"

"Oh, yes!"

"Then here's yer fust month's rent. I'll put my hosses right in."

Two dollars and a half! it seemed a fortune to Luella Eliza as she turned it over. "How good the Lord is!" she murmured. "And to think," she added, speaking to Felicity, "that I never thought to rent the barn!"

On the way to the store to buy her linings, she met Mrs. Preston.

"I'm back for awhile, you see, Luella. Are you engaged for next week?—No?—I'm glad. I wish you'd come and stay a month with me. The childrens' things all need making or mending, and so do mine. I lost so much time while I was away with mother. Bring Felicity with you. She is such a well-bred kitty that we all love her."

Luella, after thanking her with a full heart, was turning away, when Mrs. Preston called after her—

"And by the way, Luella, I mustn't forget to give you mother's kindest regards and her love. She will never forget how well you cared for her the summer she was with me. She says you are the patientest nurse she ever had."

A month later, Mrs. Preston was called away again—this time to her mother's death-bed. When she returned, she drove around one afternoon to Luella's humble home. After the two women had shed their tears together, and Luella had spoken of the Comforter who had brightened her own lonely life, Mrs. Preston said—

"I haven't come to you for sympathy alone, Luella, although I know how well you are able to give it. I have good news for you."

"For me, Mrs. Preston?"

"Yes, and I am so glad for your sake. Mamma was always fond of you. She wanted to give you a keepsake, so she has left you her large-print Bible and a little money."

"Just enough to pay off the old mortgage!" exclaimed Luella Eliza when Mrs. Preston named the amount, and as soon as her friend was gone, she went down on her knees in a little prayer of thankfulness, with her head upon the Bible.

So in one natural, helpful way or another, her wants were supplied. She learned to look for the daily miracle of the little daily helps, although she never again received the "open vision." And she was growing younger day by day with eternal youth, and more beautiful year by year with the beauty which never fades. When she put on her humble garments each day, so neatly mended, so carefully kept, it was scarcely an irreverence to say that with his Spirit dwelling within and shining out of her face, she was still "clothing the Lord in patches."

The Child—Are you the trained nurse mother said was coming?

The Nurse—Yes, dear; I'm the trained nurse.

The Child—Let's see you do some of your tricks.

From time immemorial there had been a law in Applegate, County Warwick, England, to the effect that the mayor had the best of everything in town, and, for instance, if one should say he had the best coat in the place he must add the words, "Except the mayor."

One day a stranger came to Applegate and had dinner there at the inn. After paying his bill he said to the landlord, "I've had the best dinner in the country."

The Landlord—Except the mayor.

The Stranger—Except nothing!

As a result the tourist was called before the magistrate and fined ten pounds for his breaking of the laws of the place. When the man had paid his fine he looked around him and said, slowly, "I'm the biggest fool in town, except the mayor."—Harper's Weekly.

Listening Times Needed.

What we need above all things in these crowded days is the setting apart of many listening times; times of quiet in which we can hear the heavenly voices that call to us unregarded in the busy day. The great clock bell of St. Paul's is not heard even a few streets off in the roar of traffic all day long; but it can be heard over half the metropolis in the silence of the night. One reason why God so often spoke to his servants in the night was that all was quiet then.—Selected.

Sunday pleasure-seeking weakens the moral sense, both directly and indirectly. It disobeys a law of the human soul, and that is bad enough, but it also steals the only time available for gaining any large moral help.

Some contain copies from the Old Masters, and grand as these pictures are in color and artistic skill, no one would venture to say they are correct, either as to place or costume. Other editions contain modern pictures drawn by very capable artists unfamiliar with the East.

Some Bibles are full of pictures of supposed occurrences, but to our minds no legend or tradition should be pictorially represented in a Bible. In this volume neither artist has made any attempt to illustrate by picture the divine Christ, but to depict existing customs which throw light on Bible statements. In this Bible, the pictures, whatever merit or demerit they may have, are at least true.

Reasons for Child's Play.

BY DR. HETHERINGTON, ATHLETIC DIRECTOR, UNIVERSITY OF MISSOURI.

Into the education of the child three groups of influences enter, says Dr. Clark W. Hetherington, first the home influences, which are largely beyond the jurisdiction of educators; second, the school influences, where the child learns to use the tools of mental life and comes in touch more or less with the wisdom of the ages; and third, play. A realization of what play means to the child and to society has created the Playground Movement.

The life of the child is made up largely of play; it is his chief function. The duties that come with advancing age reduce the time devoted to play and usually make it more intense, but through the years of childhood it has the same meaning. Play is an instinct upon which the life and vigor of the child depends. The impulse which compels the child to make innumerable movements—random movements at first, then movements in doing something that gives pleasure—creates the stimulus necessa a stimulus to growth and development, Authorities claim that if the child were bound in infancy so that it could not make muscular movements, it would die. And even if it lived, so essential is activity as a stimulus to growth and developement, there would result no vitality, no constitutional vigor, no health, no power for movement, no skill, no will. Without play there would be no growing-up. Play guards an organic need, which need is the stimulus of bodily activity. Modern social conditions are like bandages which restrict activities. Most of the weaknesses from which women suffer are due to the social restrictions on vigorous activities during girlhood.

Society is filled with men who are inefficient economically because insufficient play was denied them during youth. Therefore the first social argument for playgrounds is to furnish opportunities for play as a necessary stimulus to the physical development of children and to furnish better opportunities than the children can secure when left to their own resources.

But play is also Nature's method of educating mentally, socially and morally as well as physically. The child spends its life getting experiences. From bumps that teach him the meaning of falls, he goes on to social bumps that teach him the meaning of a more subtle form of fall. He experiments with his parents and teachers and learns the significance of law and authority. He experiments with his mates and learns human nature, the significance of personality, human rights and the laws of human relationship. The social development of the child comes largely through play with mates. He gives self expression to his social feelings, he sees others express themselves. There follows a social adjustment. All the feelings and emotions of adult social life are exhibited in the child's play in miniature. At play the child learns his social manners and customs. What kinds of manners and customs he learns depends upon the environment and conditions under which the play is conducted. Our reformatories, penal and charity institutions are filled with men and women who are the product of insufficient opportunities for social development through play and also of unsocial ideas gained through play under unfortunate social conditions. A young man's susceptibility to the influences of the saloon depends largely on the physical tendencies and habits of sociability developed through play. Therefore the second social argument for playgrounds and supervised play is to furnish the opportunity for normal play and a normal social development under conditions that will make the social influences productive of good citizens.

Out of these principles, then, has come the Playground Movement. Its object is to protect the rights of the child, the rights of the parent and the rights of society in play. The larger social experience is country districts and small towns as for large cities. Room is abundant. Country children have activity and the social excitement of play, but they lack experience in play and environment that encourages play. The larger social experience is needed more than by city children. Isolation and loneliness lead to mental devitalization and discontent. In small towns the play developed is seldom effective, especially for the older children. All these can be relieved by establishing playgrounds as centers for social play activities. The Playground Movement is the best means of developing a healthy, contented and happy rural life. It will relieve much of the ill-formed craving for the city.

Guess me the sunshine—baby's hair.

There are two windows where I see
My own glad face peep out at me;
These windows beam like June's own skies;
Guess me this riddle—baby's eyes.

Advance Society Letters.

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

Last year, Arkansas gave for Foreign Missions, more than 37 of the other states gave, respectfully. Well, you say, what of it? Why, this, for instance. S. J. Corey says "Last year 1,116 additions were made to our church in foreign lands; this year we bring you the report of 1,912 additions."

Are you an Elk, or a mere human? The national convention of the Elks will be held in Dallas, Tex., in 1908. That is where the "Dallas News" is published. I received an envelope last week with the "Dallas News" return-card printed thereon, and I wondered if some one else was about to heap denunciations upon my head for my feeble tribute to Texas. But instead I found ever so many inclosed stamps and this—

"Here is one dollar for Drusie, and one for Charlie. How's Felix?"

Well sir, Felix has developed a new trait, so uncannily human, that it is worthy of remark. I will explain. I printed on this page some weeks ago a promise from one G. Gordon, of El Oro, Mexico, to send $3 for our missionary Drusie. He sent the $3 in due time and then came on himself, to pay a visit to the Ozarks. Owing to the peculiarity of the family, Felix is kept mainly on a vegetable diet, but of course the presence of company in the house had necessitated an enormous inlay of meats. At first Felix was almost paralyzed with delight over the fragments of ham, chicken, steak, pork and sausage that came to his plate. His cup was literally running over and all that he desired in the wide world was his for the asking.

In a short time Felix began to develop a choice between beef and pork, then between the conditions of hot and cold. A day or so later, he discriminated against ham; then he showed a decided antipathy to it; then he became clamorous if he was not given beef; then he waxed violent if his beef was not warm. To-day, there is only a certain tender cut of the beef that he will tolerate. And when he gets it, he is hardly satisfied. He hasn't caught a mouse for a week. To-day he is a millionaire cat. But I fancy he'll be quick enough to dispose of his bonds at a sacrifice on the market, when G. Gordon leaves.

The other night the Christian Endeavor Society had a social here, and on that day Felix was sitting on the softest rug in the parlor before a cheerful fire, quietly shedding his hair—when we began taking out the table and other things that you put in your back yard out of the way, when you give parties, you know. Well, Felix saw the old familiar roommarks vanishing and the idea came into his head that we were going to move again. I don't know whether he thought we were going back to Missouri, or to a more Arkansaw Arkansas than Bentonville. At any rate, the vision of a pine box with slats over the top bounded before his vision, and he bristled like a bear and fled from supposed imprisonment.

Pearle Hopkins, Woodward, Okla.: "Knowing that you are always interested in missionary work, I thought maybe you would help me a little with our Christian Endeavor—I have been president of the society here for two years. Can you suggest some missionary work for our society to take up? Our society is real good; small in numbers but not so in purpose. What is required of one to join the Advance Society. I might interest some in that. Can you tell me about Endeavor quarterlies?"

"The Endeavorer," Kansas City, Mo., is a monthl magazine, each number containing the lessons of the 4 weeks; it thus serves as a topic card only it is much fuller on each lesson, besides pages of valuable C. E. news; it is only 10 cents a year; it has been adopted as the state paper by Arkansas, Missouri, Kansas and Nebraska. Why not take this paper? I know one of the editors,—Martha Stout Trimble; a very active member of the Christian church. As to missionary work, the regular work set apart for the C. E. Societies of the Christian church is the orphanage at Damoh, India. Write to F. M. Rains, Cincinnati, for particulars. By the way, once I offered in this page to send F. M. Rains $1 for foreign missions, if he found the offer in our page without being told it was there; but I never heard from him. I offer it again. If he sees this, without somebody having told him to look for it, and will write and tell me so, I'll send on $1 from the Av. S.

As to the rules of the Av. S., they are so simple that I wish we might have many new members coming in at this season of the year. They are: Read 5 pp. history and 30 lines poetry, weekly; Bible-verse, daily; memorize a good quotation, weekly; keep an account of work done in your note book. That's all.

W. D. Cunningham, Tokyo, Japan: "In some respects this has been our best year in Japan. Evangelistic meetings were held every week at all three of our stations,—helping to evangelize the 30 millions who have never been evangelized before. Among those baptized were two school-teachers, one military officer, a bank clerk, a young doctor, an assistant army paymaster, one postal clerk and several college students. Two of the latter have gone to America to complete their studies."

Ama Jones, Plattsburg, Mo.: "I inclose 15 cents, which I've long intended to send for little Charlie."

From Sadie Pugsley, Woodbine, Iowa, comes a card bearing a rough embossed cat (I don't know if this is the technical term in artistic circles) and this poetry thereon:

"I am a friendly pussy cat
And love afar to roam,
But if you want to scratch my back
I'll gladly stay at home."

The cat painted with sulphur-colored eyes, suggesting that the scratching is to be done with a match. I am grateful; but sorry to find "Felix" written beneath the cat, for the picture is as unlike Felix as can well be imagined; I mean in expression. This picture-card cat has the most sentimental, foolish expression I ever saw, and he wears a red ribbon with a bow under his chin. You can't think how foreign such things as bows and ribbons are to Felix's disposition. This is the tenth picture I have received purporting to be a likeness of Felix, yet all lacking in individuality. Some people, in fact, many people, think that a cat is a cat; whereas often a cat is not a cat at all.

John C. Lloyd, Dighton, Kans.: "I am sending my first quarterly of Av. S. work. I have completed my 2nd quarter, but the account is in a book at the school house, 4 miles away. I hope Charlie gets a good Christmas vacation. It is too bad he didn't get to see his little sister, but he saved that much money. Tell Felix that we have a Newfoundland pup; and that he's just as aristocratic as Felix is. His name is Jess."

Mrs. C. E. Sandbery, Red Wing, Minn.: "Enclosed, please find $1,—50 cents for Drusie, 50 for Charlie."

Walren Davis, Trentin, Nebr.: "I have read the Thanksgiving number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and it makes me want to join the Av. S. No wonder Ruby Lacy Taylor forgot to read her verse, traveling all day from Indiana to Missouri. Do you know how Harry Buckley (Lawrenceburg, Ky.) is getting along? I hope he is well by this time. That was pretty good, what you said about the pupils of Kimberlin Heights. I am just going to wait and see, now, if any of those who ate supper there November 16th, will write to thank the Av. S. for their bread. For history, I think I will read Redpath's History of the World. We don't study that at school."

Mamie Duvall, Orange, La.: "I have decided to take up the Av. S. work, and hope to be on the Honor List in twelve weeks. But I can't promise to learn as long quotations as that one you gave from Sadie Pugsley's report."

Elmer Wiston, Aday, Ore.: "Here is my first quarterly report. You will see I have made out each week's work separate, giving what I did on each day. It took a good deal of time, but I found it interesting. I like it."

Nell Marville, East Point, Ind.: "You are right in what you said about the Av. S. making us like history and poetry. When I took up the five rules, I thought I never would like either; but now, after keeping the rules seven quarters, I find that history is really interesting; that is, some are. I used to think that a book just had to be history to be dull and dry; but now I like some histories as much as I do stories. And you will see by the inclosed 7th report that I have read a great deal more poetry than you require; nearly 20 times as much. Mamma says she can never thank the Av. S. enough for its getting me out of the habit of reading nothing but stories. And so Felix is jealous? How surprising! I am sure he has no cause for jealousy against you, for I never knew you to show the least interest in anybody else's cat but your own!"

Unkind, unkind cut! I am sorry to say I do not know how Harry Buckley is; but will try to find out for our next page.

Drusie Malott, North China: "Boys are coming in little groups to the school right along". (This was written in October.) "There are now over 120 boys,—3 times as many as this time last year. Perhaps it is partly because food is so high, the parents are glad to have their boys fed and clothed cheaper than at home. There are 14 school girls,—6 more than last year. Besides, there are some orphans, too little for school; we had none such last year. Food continues about double price, and there must be much suffering this winter. People earn from 5 to 7 cents a day, and many, many can not get work. Sewing for our boys gives work to a number of women. It is no little work to make wadded suits for 120 boys,—and more coming! We expect 250 children this winter. Do you remember the Taiming-fu cook, for whom I asked prayers last summer—the one struggling against the opium habit? Well, he is doing nicely, much stronger physically, and, better still, is progressing spiritually and really seems to be delivered from his former appetite. I praise God for this answer to prayer.

"It is somewhat cooler, now. I expect to have my first fire in my room to-morrow if the tinner comes to put up the stovepipe and repairs the stove. It is a new stove, just arrived from America, but it was badly battered up; and had a hole knocked in the bottom."

I think Roosevelt ought to see to it that good American stoves get to Chinese missionaries without a hole in the bottom. But perhaps he is too busy getting "In God we Trust" off our money.

Bentonville Ark.

Jimmy's Club.

A gentleman sat in a plain office, puzzling his head over a perplexing question. He was the agent of a benevolent society, organized to help the poor of a great city. The trouble was this:

Thanksgiving was at hand, and he had not money enough to do all that he wished to do on the coming day. He knew, too, many families who lived at starving point, to whom Thanksgiving gave little apparent reason for thanks.

He knew young men who did not hesitate to spend three dollars on a single rose. He knew young ladies who thought nothing of wasting more or less dollars a week on candy. Twenty-five cents would buy a sumptuous dinner for a starving child.

Many hundreds of the extremely poor looked to this man for one good dinner at Thanksgiving time. For one day in the year they hoped to have enough to eat. How was he to give it?

Suddenly three or four dirty faces peered through the window; a timid knock followed. Five street boys and two somewhat tattered little girls trooped in. The agent recognized them as members of a mission Sabbath school. He said pleasantly:

"Well, children, what can I do for you to-day?"

"Nothin'," answered the children vaguely.

"You, Jimmy you tell," said one of the girls, giving the tallest boy a shove. Jimmy fumbled in his ragged pocket and slowly produced a large handful of pennies and small change.

"We are a club," said Jimmy, with a grand air. "There's twenty of us, mister."

"We girls are in it, too," interrupted the girl who gave the shove.

"We come from Cummin's Alley and we're a club to help Thanksgivin'. Here's—here's—nine dollars and ninety cents."

The agent stared at the large sum, collected at what cost of self-sacrifice only the givers could say.

"It's for them that can't git no dinner," explained the little spokesman.

"Is it?" exclaimed the good man. He hardly knew what to say as he glanced at the poor clothes and shrunken cheeks of the "Club."

"Yes," said Jimmy, stoutly, "there's plenty poorer than us, mister; we're a club to help 'em. We didn't care if we didn't have a dinner for two or three days so'st that we might give real poor folks one."

"How many dinners will nine dollars and ninety cents get?" asked a little girl, rather hungrily.

"What kind of a dinner?" inquired the agent, with a perceptible weakening in his voice.

"Oh—turkey and stuffin', and—and puddin'!" cried the children, eagerly.

"That will cost perhaps twenty-five cents apiece," said the agent, "and your money will give a fine Thanksgiving dinner to as many as thirty-five hungry people. You have done nobly, children, and I am delighted that you have been so kind and thoughtful for others."

The dinners were bought. "The Club" distributed them. The children's first plan was to put a cabbage in with each dinner, the agent says. But there were not cabbages enough to go around. So they cut each cabbage into quarters, and put one piece into each bag.

That club of twenty poverty-stricken children worked until nine o'clock at night on the day before Thanksgiving, distributing thirty-five dinners to people "poorer than themselves."

This is a true story, and one that should make our easy blood tingle with something akin to shame.

—Roger L. Clark, the enterprising minister of the Savannah, Ga., church, evidently has no fears of our continued orthodoxy. He has just advanced his subscription to THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST five years.

—By return mail send your order for Bible school literature. The best that is prepared for the Churches of Christ is now being mailed out from this House and in larger quantities than ever before in our history.

—Marion Stevenson has been called in from holding institutes among the churches to give the finishing touches to his invaluable supplemental work that will be a feature of our new Teachers' Quarterlies. We are now ready to book engagements for him through January and February.

—We are pleased to know that so many of our larger Bible-schools will have made great improvement in the Bible-school literature they distribute to their attendants through 1908,—that is another way of saying that a great many of them are, for the first time, ordering their Bible-school helps from this House.

—A good Bible is always an appropriate gift. We have them ranging in price from 40 cents to $14.00. Write us whether you wish the American Revised or King James version and the price you wish to pay and we will select one we think will please you from our great stock and will mail to your friend in time for Christmas and will inclose your presentation card.

—Our Bible schools that do not have a pin cushion black-board are denying themselves one of the most useful pieces of equipment we have yet prepared for the "up-to-dates." One side of this board can be used in the ordinary way, while to the other may easily be attached pictures and other illustrations of the lessons that will greatly enhance the children's interest in them. The board, table, and pictures complete for $15.00. This is of especial value to teachers of primary classes.

—We regret that the list of clubs is not longer and larger this week. We have at least 1,000 preachers in the United States who could and would through the vivid realization of the value of a Christian paper in the homes of their members secure us at least 10 new subscribers in time to report in next week's issue. Will you not, kind reader, send your ten?

His purpose is to promote a continuous state of evangelism in every congregation.

—The Christ From Without and Within. By Henry Clark, the author of "Philosophy of Christian Experience." $1.25. —Singular Actions of Consistent Christians. By Wm. Secker. $1.00. This book is supposed to have been written more than one hundred years ago. It is a very remarkable book. —Down in Water Street. By Saml. H. Hadley. $1.00. This is a story of sixteen years' life work in Water Street Mission, a sequel to the life of Jerry McAuley. It is a thrilling and intensely interesting book, mainly autobiographical; but it begins with a short account of Jerry McAuley. It is not only living testimony to the renewing power of the Gospel of John, but it is a valuable study of methods of personal work with those lost in vice and villainy.

—God's Message to the Human Soul. By John Watson (Ian McLaren). $1.25, net. The volume contains the gifted writer's latest message concerning the Bible viewed as God's Message to the human soul. He does not devote much space to the discussion of the higher criticism, but some of the results of modern scholarship he assumes as true and uses them in interpreting the Bible as God's message of moral truth to the soul of man. There is much of the charm of the "Bonnie Brier Bush" in every chapter of the book.

—Difficulties in the Bible. By R. A. Torrey. $.50. This book is the popular evangelist's answer to many alleged errors and contradictions found in the Bible. He has taken up those objections of which the modern infidel makes the most, and which are most puzzling to many Christians. It is exceptionally valuable to Christians other than preachers who have never had the opportunity in Bible colleges of learning the best replies to the scoffer. Among these difficulties are: God Hardening Pharaoh's Heart, The Imprecatory Psalms, The Antiquity of Man, etc.

—Christ's Service of Love. By Hugh Black. $1.25. The author is Professor of Practical Theology in Union Theological Seminary. This book of sermons is designed for devotional reading, therefore the communion service is the heart and center. He declares it to be a perversion of the use of the word "communion" to have it represent what separates churches from one another instead of what should really unite them. He deprecates such terms as Episcopal, Presbyterian, or Baptist communion. This is one of the greatest books we have secured for our winter's sale.

Volume XLIV. ST. LOUIS, DECEMBER 19, 1907. Number 51.

Current Events

Christmas and "Sectarianism."

About this time every year there is more or less disturbance in the larger cities on the subject of the alleged "sectarian" observance of Christmas in the public schools. The Jews in New York City are especially regular and vigorous in their objections. On account of their agitation, certain features of the Christmas celebrations have been placed under the ban. This in turn has called out impassioned protest from those who believe that there ought to be a thoroughly religious celebration of Christmas in every school. The Daughters of the Revolution of the state of New York are among the latter group of protesters. They declare in a resolution that "this country was established in order that its inhabitants might worship the Lord Jesus Christ without let or hindrance." The Daughters of the Revolution ought to know that this statement is not historically true. The desire for religious liberty was the chief motive in bringing certain important groups of colonists to these shores in the seventeenth century, but that is not the same thing. Our accepted theory of the separation of church and state does not permit us to teach in the public schools everything that some believe to be true. The trinitarian doctrine of God, the inspiration of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, baptism by immersion for the remission of sins,—most of us may believe in these things, but we do not believe that they are proper subjects for instruction in the public schools. It is possible to observe Christmas in such a way as to make it include sectarian instruction in the objectionable sense. We do not recall that we have ever seen it done, but it very easily may be done. There is a justifiable ground in theory, and perhaps sometimes in practice, for the Jewish protest. But, on the other hand, Christmas is an institution which cannot be ignored. It stands for certain facts and principles which are far removed from sectarianism, however loosely that term may be used. Few Jews or infidels or atheists deny the moral beauty of the character of Jesus. None deny his historical reality. All see in him an admirable example of purity and unselfishness and nobility of character. There is nothing sectarian in the spirit of Christmas. Any celebration of the day which throws the emphasis upon this spirit and avoids as much as possible the disputed doctrines about the nature and office of Jesus, is sufficiently unsectarian to be in harmony with the spirit of our institutions. The Jews are right in saying that any doctrine, such as the divinity of Jesus, which is considered as sectarian during the rest of the year, ought also to be considered as sectarian during the last week in December. But we have never yet met a Jew who would claim that our free institutions would be in any way endangered or the political rights of Jew or Gentile jeopardized by the spreading abroad of the spirit of Jesus. If any person, by reason of his own doctrinal and sectarian beliefs, is interested in keeping the school children from the knowledge of the historical person of Jesus and the imitation of his character, then the sectarianism is in him rather than in the Christmas celebration which he criticizes.

The Great Refusal.

The President has again declined the third term which some of his friends would like to offer to him. In a brief and explicit statement which was issued from the White House last Thursday, the President quotes the statement which he gave out on election night three years ago, in which he said that he would consider the term to which he had just been elected as his second term of office and declared that "under no circumstances will I be a candidate or accept another term." After quoting this statement, he only adds: "I have not changed and shall not change the decision thus announced." A few days prior to this, an order was issued forbidding federal employes to work for his renomination or to attend the national convention as delegates instructed to vote for him. It is impossible to believe th t the President is not well enough informed regarding political conditions throughout the country to appreciate the full force of the third term movement. There might be reasons why he should over-estimate his own strength as a candidate, but there is no reason why he should be tempted to under-estimate it. If, therefore, he persistently declines in good faith at this stage of the campaign, it is not to be expected that there will be developed any third-term sentiment sufficiently overwhelming to justify a reversal of this decision. It would perhaps have been possible to recall the statement made three years ago and to claim that the situation had altered unexpectedly so as to render the acceptance of another candidacy proper. There would, we think, have been nothing essentially perfidious in such a course. But to go back on such a statement as this last one, issued so short a time before the meeting of the convention and when the other candidates have already declared themselves, would be an act of bad faith without parallel in presidential campaigns. For the first time, we are convinced that the President is completely out of the running. His friends and enemies alike owe it to him to accept this refusal as absolute. They may assign what motives they please to his refusal, ranging from the loftiest patriotism to a shrewd perception of the fact that probably he could not be re-elected even if he were nominated. They may say that he still hopes to rule but expects to do so by securing the election of a man who will follow his leadership and carry out his policies. But in any event it ought to be taken as an accepted fact that the name of Mr. Roosevelt will not appear upon the ticket of his party in 1908.

The Party Conventions.

The national committees of the two great parties were in session last week and decided upon the time and place of the forthcoming nominating conventions. The Republican Convention will be held in Chicago, beginning June 16. The Democratic Convention will assemble in Denver, July 7. As is right and proper, the Democrats, being at present the party of opposition, will have the advantage of the last word in the formation of platforms. They can wait until the Republicans have affirmed their faith, so that they may know exactly what they have to deny. It is unusual for a national political convention to go as far west as Denver, but there is no reason why it should not do so. The attendance will be just as large. Everybody who has any business there (and a great many who have none) will go, regardless of distance. Besides, Denver is a splendid city in which to hold a convention in the summer. St. Louis is a good convention city, but even her most devoted partisans are forced to admit that sometimes it is warm in July. Denver, a mile high, has reasonably cool summers. It is a climate conducive to work. Probably the representatives of Denver were well within the limits of the literal truth when they claimed that a convention could do more work in two days in Denver at that season that it could do in three in any of the superheated cities of the Mississippi Valley. The campaign is now really on. Taft and Fairbanks (we had almost forgotten Fairbanks) have through their respective managers engaged the quarters at the Auditorium Hotel, in Chicago, from which their campaigns will be directed. Gov. Cummins, of Iowa, is apparently about to announce himself a candidate for the nomination. Senator Foraker has already done so.

Mr. Adolphus Busch, head of the great brewing firm of Anheuser-Busch, says that the prohibition clause in the new Oklahoma constitution will cost him a million dollars. That's queer. We thought we had heard it said that prohibition does not prohibit. Mr. Busch, who is in a position to know something about it, seems to be emphatically of the opinion that state prohibition is a decided inconvenience to the promoters of the liquor business.

When Jesus Came.*

The return of Christmastide recalls the advent of the World's Redeemer. He came in the fullness of time. The world needed him. Roman civilization had grown effeminate and corrupt beyond redemption. Hebrew religion had come to be hard, mechanical, materialistic and Pharisaic. Grecian philosophy had outgrown its mythology and was atheistic. The world by wisdom knew not God. It was sick, but among all its wise men there was no physician to prescribe a remedy for its ills. Roman power, Hebrew law, Grecian philosophy—these had been tried and found wanting. Not government, not rules of conduct, not intellectual culture, could arrest the world's downward course. It needed gospel—good news.

Then came Jesus. The prophets had foretold him. Hebrew poets had sung of him. Wise men were watching for his advent. The Gentile world, even, had expectation of his coming. He came, not as men had expected he would come, but as God had ordained that he should come. In weakness and poverty he came. His cradle was a manger, and he shared the lot of the lowly. He attended no school, but taught senators and philosophers wisdom. No college put its seal of honor upon him, but he climbed the mountainside, and communed with his Father. He showed the world his Father's loving heart and gracious purpose. Sinning not himself, he was full of compassion for the sinner. Dying, he conquered death. His blood is the sinner's plea. His empty sepulchre is the charter of immortality. He gathered no armed hosts, but the Roman Empire was soon at his feet. He wrote no book, but the world is crowded with literature about him. He composed no song, but his cross has filled the earth with its sweetest music. A man of sorrows, he has made millions happy. He wore a crown of thorns, but he offers a crown of life to all his follower. He plucked the thorn of despair from the world's heart and planted therein the rose of hope, which has filled the centuries with its fragrance. His wounded hand unbarred the gates of death, and robbed Satan of his prey. His gospel is the marching song of the world's progress, and his cross the harbinger of victory. No rumbling of war-chariots, no tread of armed legions, no blare of trumpets, nor groans of the wounded and dying mark his advance. By a scepter of love he sways the hearts of men, and his government is the reign of peace. Nations yield to his authority and the isles of the sea wait for his law.

No marvel that the world grows happier, that men's hearts beat faster, that children's faces shine brighter, and that the wrinkled brow of age becomes smoother, with the return of the season associated with the birth of such a King. Let all the bells of Christendom peal forth their joyous notes. Let the world pause from its toil, as it catches from tower and steeple the echo of that angelic song which rang out over Judean hills when Jesus came.

"The Heart of the Gospel."* IV.

In reviewing a book that contains so much that is admirable, it seems almost ungracious to point out what seem to be blemishes, but there are a few points where our author, as it seems to us, departs from his characteristic clearness, and where, it is to be feared, his readers will be confused. An instance of this kind is where the author treats of what forgiveness is. Forgiveness, he tells us, is a "divine act." "It is something that takes place in the heart and will of God but it is also something which terminates in man." Further on we are told, in connection with the statement of Dr. Dale—"That the remission of sins, if it stood alone, would leave us unsaved"—that this view is "based upon the utterly false assumption that the remission of sin is an external act, consisting in the sending of it away, so as not to count against the sinner; instead of what it really is, a spiritual act, consisting of the sending of it away from the sinner himself, so that it can no longer count against him. Nowhere in the New Testament has remission to do with penalty, but always with sin" (p. 80). There is no evidence that "remission of sins" is used here in a different sense from "forgiveness of sins." This is a possible view of forgiveness, or remission of sins, but it seems impossible to understand it in this sense, in many of the uses which the author makes of it, and in many passages of Scripture which he cites. For instance, "Be kind to one another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another even as God also in Christ forgave you." (Eph. 4:32).

There it is said we are to forgive one another as God forgives us, and the same truth is taught in the Lord's prayer; but it is not possible for one man to put away sin from the life of another man, in the sense that God does. Forgiveness of sin, therefore, must have a different meaning, at least in many of its uses. There can be no question that sin is to be put away from the heart and the life in order to salvation, but ordinarily we think of this moral renovation as taking place in the spiritual experiences which we call faith and repentance; and then there comes the change of God's attitude toward the sinner, which is called forgiveness. If we include this whole process of the sinner's renovation, and God's changed attitude toward the sinner in consequence, in the one word "forgiveness" we render cloudy and confused what would otherwise seem clear.

Again, on the subject of repentance, the author makes this the sole condition of our receiving the benefits of the atonement. "For man's repentance God waits and works. It is the only satisfaction that he desires or demands. Until it is supplied he can not forgive his erring child" (p. 71). Again, "Ethically considered, repentance is the first round of the ladder of perfection; the birth of the soul into a new life" (p. 77). Once more: "There is begotten within him a new purpose of amendment, which abides and strengthens after his tears are dried. * * * The power of repentance unto redemption lies in this, that it lodges in the heart a new spirit and principle of action which leads to the building up of things which have been destroyed" (pp. 77, 78). Just as in the author's definition of forgiveness, he seems to crowd into that word the whole process of man's moral renovation, so in the word "repentance" he seems to put all that we include usually in both repentance and faith.

After passing over several chapters, the author deals with "The Function of Faith." In this chapter he refers to his former treatment of "repentance as the sine qua non of salvation," but now he tells us that "repentance, however, is only the first stage of spiritual receptivity. It finds its fruition or culmination in faith. Faith is the larger and deeper word" (p. 170).

Again, he quotes Dr. James Morrison as calling repentance "the reverse side of faith," and says that "the two together form a unity." Evidently, then, faith should have been treated in close connection with repentance, and the relation of the two to each other should have been clearly stated. The author is right in saying that "Faith is the larger and deeper word." But that it is faith in Christ that makes repentance in its Christian sense possible, is what our author does not seem to see. The command of Jesus to the Jews of his time, to "Repent and believe the gospel," was the necessary order of things, because they were not living up to the beliefs which they acknowledged, and the light which they possessed. God expects us to be true to the light we have, before he gives us further light. Faith has two aspects—one is spiritual vision or discernment, and the other is personal trust. It is faith in this first aspect, as discerning the truth, which makes repentance possible. On the other hand, it is repentance of such sins as are known to us that makes faith in its higher aspect possible. It is only as men come, by the power of faith in Christ, to discern his true nature and character, and to see themselves in the light of God's revelation to him, that they are led to "repentance unto life," and to commit themselves in whole-hearted self-surrender to Christ. Our author speaks truly of a "growth in repentance" which, he says, "will mean growth in Christ." But this growth in repentance is conditioned upon a growing faith which reveals a continuously advancing ideal, and demands a corresponding adjustment of the life to such ideal.

But, on the whole, we feel grateful to Dr. Campbell for his reverent and sane treatment of this great theme. One can not lay down his book, after a careful perusal of its pages, without feeling that if the death of Christ, as therein presented, were clearly apprehended and vividly realized by the ministry of to-day, they would indeed have the "new evangel," well adapted to bring in the "new evangelism" which is to both widen and deepen the reign of Christ, and subdue the nations by the power of his uplifted cross.

The "Christian-Evangelist" for 1908.

THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will enter upon its forty-fifth volume with the beginning of next month. It will also be the fortieth year of the present Editor's continuous connection with the paper. It will begin the year with the largest circulation in its history, and there is reason to believe that its gain in circulation during the year will be the greatest in its history. It has a program before it for the coming year that surpasses in importance that of any previous volume. It purposes to discuss, not only editorially, some of the great problems which confront us as a religious movement, but to bring to bear the consensus of judgment of the brotherhood on these important questions which are before us. As THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has led in all the important measures of the brotherhood looking to our progressive development along safe and scriptural lines toward the fulfillment of our mission, so, with the help of our readers, and relying upon divine guidance, we shall seek to point out the best solution of the practical problems with which we have to deal. We shall be glad to receive from any reader, on a postal card, what in his judgment are at least three of the most important problems before us. It would seem an opportune time, as we are approaching our centennial celebration, to face, with honest and inquiring minds, these unsolved problems in so far as they are related to our religious growth and practical work, and in so far as they may admit of present solution.

What we hope to do during the coming year is simply to lead the way for a free and fraternal consideration of those questions which have to do with the more successful prosecution of our work, the better utilization of our forces, and the direction in which our energies should be applied for the accomplishment of the best results.

The approach of our Centennial would seem to render appropriate and timely a series of historical sketches of the pioneers, and incidents connected with their careers and their places in our history. We are planning for a series of such articles by different writers who have made a study of these men and would be able to give our readers an idea of the contribution which each has made to our historical development. These will serve to furnish a sort of condensed history of the movement itself, as all important history clusters about its great personalities. This, we believe, will be a valuable educational series for the younger generation of Christians now coming upon the stage of action.

Of course, the well-known features of the paper will be retained, and as far as possible, improved. We shall especially aim to elicit from our readers a large number of brief articles from writers whose names do not so often appear in our columns. In order to make room for these we shall be compelled to cut down the number of longer articles. In a word, our aim is to popularize the paper as far as possible without lowering its tone or making any appeal to passion or prejudice.

In these aims we solicit the hearty cooperation of all our friends to the end that the forthcoming volume of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST may present such record of work accomplished, and of such discussion of important problems as will make it of permanent value to the great cause we plead.

A Visit to Des Moines.

The Editor of this paper has just returned from a visit of two days in the capital of Iowa, where he arrived on Saturday evening and left on Monday evening. The occasion of the visit was a great downtown rally of all our churches in the auditorium on Sunday afternoon, which we were invited to address.

It was our pleasure to atttend the University Church in the morning, where Brother C. S. Medbury ministers, and to listen to a stirring discourse from him on "The Poverty of Unbelief." It was an inspiring audience, with an inspiring sermon and inspiring music. At the close we had the pleasure of addressing the audience a few minutes by way of greetings and congratulations, and a word on the suggestive theme of the morning.

This great church of two thousand members, under the able ministry of Brother Medbury, is doing magnificent work on all the lines pursued by a living church to-day. It was more than a happy accident that brought together this able minister of the word and this great church, with its possibilities of wide usefulness under wise leadership. The very atmosphere of the great congregation was a spiritual tonic and the students of Drake University who worship there cannot fail to catch a vision of the dignity of Christian life and service which will abide with them through the coming years.

The great meeting in the auditorium at two-thirty in the afternoon, estimated at three thousand, was an occasion long to be remembered. Seldom does it fall to the lot of the average preacher to address so inspiring an audience, gathered under such inspiring circumstances. The very air was electric with religious enthusiasm. The great chorus of two hundred voices, on the platform, aided by the great audience, rendered such music as lifts one's soul above the earthly and temporal, into the realm of the spiritual and the eternal. Never has it been our privilege to address a more appreciative and attentive audience while we sought to show that the things for which we plead are grounded on the eternal, basic principles of right and truth, and in harmony with God's great purposes. At the close of the address came a great communion service, presided over by the beloved veteran, Dr. D. R. Dungan, who spoke fitting words preceding the solemn service. There were several tables, served by brethren appointed for that purpose, a large corps of deacons, and the whole service was carried out with a precision and order that reflected great credit upon the management. The entire service of the occasion was presided over by Brother H. E. Van Horn, minister for the Capitol Hill Church on the east side.

This is the first of these great gatherings which the brethren hope to make semi-annual occasions. The unity and hearty co-operation existing between the ten churches, we believe, in Des Moines, is worthy of all admiration and imitation. When the churches of a given city can marshall their forces like these brethren in Des Moines do, they are in a condition not only to impress themselves and the things for which they stand on the community, but to accomplish any worthy undertaking to which they set their hands.

It was our privilege to attend another great meeting at the Central Christian Church in the evening and hear Brother Finis Idleman deliver a most earnest and heart-searching discourse to a great audience, at the close of which one lady came forward to confess her faith in Christ. Every one felt that when Brother H. O. Breeden resigned the pastorate of this great church it would be a difficult task to find a successor to fill his place. Bro. Idleman, though differing greatly in temperament, in style of preaching and in methods, from his predecessor, is measuring up to the demands of the church which is enthusiastic in its devotion to him and to the work. To have two such men as Medbury and Idleman, in these two great churches, working shoulder to shoulder, reinforced by a group of strong young men preaching for the smaller churches in other parts of the city, and all pulling together, with the added prestige of Drake University, is a sure prophecy of great things for the future of our work in Des Moines.

At the close of the regular service at the Central on Sunday evening Brother Idleman called an after-meeting in the chapel to which enough remained to fill it to overflowing, and again we had the privilege of addressing this audience for a few minutes, in connection with Dean

Haggard, who also spoke. It proved to be a very tender and helpful service, closing a day full of religious activity and joy in the Lord.

Monday's program was scarcely less crowded. At noon there was a great gathering of the men of the churches at the Central Christian Church, where luncheon was served by the ladies, and at which we spoke by request on the Laymen's Movement. This was an enthusiastic hour, and we would not dare report the things said at that meeting by ministers and laymen about our visit and its meaning to them. At four o'clock Dean Haggard had arranged a meeting of the ministerial students and others in Hobbs Hall, of the Memorial Bible Building of Drake University. Between luncheon and this hour President Hill M. Bell showed us through the various buildings of the university and pointed out its different departments of work. One who has not visited Drake recently can scarcely realize the magnitude of the plant, its equipment, and the splendid diversified work that is carried on along educational lines. Over twelve hundred students have been enrolled for the first term of this session —the largest enrollment in the history of the institution. Over one hundred and fifty of these are ministerial students. President Bell has proved himself eminently fitted for the responsible position he occupies. It was a delightful hour we had with the ministerial students, and if they enjoyed our lecture half as much as we enjoyed the privilege of talking to them, the hour was not in vain.

It was a pleasure to be entertained in the home of Dean A. M. Haggard, who, with his wife, the daughter of our old co-laborer, B. W. Johnson, did everything in their power to make our stay pleasant. Bro. Haggard has been nine years in the University and has grown with the demands of his work until he holds an honored and influential position in the institution as Dean of the Bible College. We had the pleasure, too, of spending a while in the elegant home of our old-time friends, Brother Peak and his wife, the daughter of another old friend, A. I. Hobbs, whose widow we had the opportunity of meeting in the same home. The hearty reception which we received from the brethren in Des Moines, and the fellowship we enjoyed with them will abide with us as a sweet and precious memory.

We have written thus at some length of this visit to Des Moines, because (1) it is now our largest educational center; (2) because there is a unity and religious enthusiasm among the Disciples in that city that happily illustrates our plea for unity, and makes our cause felt in the city; and (3) because there is a sane, safe, middle-of-the-road progressive conservatism in the type of religious thought which we there found, that, in our judgment, holds the future for the great cause we plead. Des Moines is a great factor in our work.

Notes and Comments.

Dr. Torrey, evangelist, is quoted as saying recently:

"Once upon a time I believed that I knew some things which God had not clearly revealed to the world. But one day I awoke to the fact that I knew absolutely nothing outside of what God teaches us in his word—the Bible."

We presume Mr. Torrey refers to religious truth. Science is continually bringing to light facts and truths in the physical realm, of which the Bible makes no revelation. The Bible is able to make us "wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ," but it does not pretend to teach astronomy, geology, nor anything else which men can find out for themselves. Whatever it does in that line is incidental.

"Sectarianism never had as few friends as now. Here and there, it is true, a leader still strives to cultivate a sectarian spirit as diligently as though it were one of the Christian graces, but the people are weary of it."—Dr. Frank M. Goodchild.

But even those "here and there" leaders who wish to "cultivate a sectarian spirit" are compelled to do so under cover of another name which bears more resemblance to one of the Christian graces." The martyr-fires of Smithfield were kindled in the alleged interest of "the truth," and the glory of God.

There is no inquiry that comes to our desk oftener than this: "Did Alexander Campbell make or use a human creed?" The question almost uniformly comes from brethren who live in communities where the Disciples of Christ are little known, and where some preacher has made such charge against Mr. Campbell. Sometimes, however, the opposite course is taken, and we are charged with being a "creedless" people. Neither charge is correct. Mr. Campbell never made nor accepted as authoritative any human creed. Indeed, one of the fundamental positions of both Thomas and Alexander Campbell, and of all the leaders in the movement from their day to the present time, has been and is, that Jesus Christ alone is authority in the realm of religious faith and doctrine and duty, and that human creeds, as such, have no authority to bind the consciences of men. Alexander Campbell, and others among us, have written books setting forth the things for which we contend, but no one of these has ever been made a standard of faith or doctrine among us. On the other hand, Mr. Campbell, and all those who are really identified with the movement which he inaugurated, do accept heartily and without reservation the old creed confessed by Simon Peter: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," and the New Testament as the only authoritative rule of faith and practice.

In a recent editorial paragraph, referring to the report of the Federation meeting at Norfolk by J. B. Briney in the "Christian Standard," we quoted from a well-known brother who characterized the report as "unfair and distorted," and as likely to do injury to Brother Briney. We learn through a letter from Brother Briney that he regards this language as reflecting upon his honesty and truthfulness. We scarcely need say, for the benefit of most of our readers at least, that to intentionally attribute dishonesty or untruthfulness to Brother Briney would be impossible for us. We have too long known and respected the Christian character of Brother Briney to do such a thing. It is a well-known fact, however, that the best of men, under the influence of certain pre-possessions or prejudices, unconsciously and unintentionally present a given situation in a wrong light. To put it mildly, their representations are one-sided. That all of us do this, more or less, even when we mean to be fair and honest, is a fact which we should all recognize. We never supposed for a moment that Brother Briney was consciously or intentionally misrepresenting the meeting which he reported, and yet it was very different from other reports of the same meeting by brethren who are equally honest and conscientious. But if any reader has drawn from the paragraph referred to the inference that we question for a moment Brother Briney's honesty and integrity, such inference is wrong, and we take great pleasure in making this correction and explanation.

Mr. T. H. Perrin, a lay delegate from St. Louis to the Presbyterian conference in New York to plan for united effort on the part of the Presbyterian bodies in their foreign mission work, on his return expressed the conviction that Protestantism would soon be united in a triple union in which churches of similar methods of government will come together, those of the Episcopal form of government forming one group; those of the Presbyterian form a second group, and those of the congregational form of government a third group. This would be gain, no doubt, but it would not measure up to the demands of Christ's prayer for the unity of his followers.

An aged brother nearing his four-score years, sends us a clipping containing Brother McGarvey's recent criticism of our editorial on "Destructive Criticism," and adds: "Just as I was about to say with Simeon, 'Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace', behold, you and Brother Lord get into a quarrel!" The venerable brother then rebukes the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST very sternly for his quarrelsome disposition in making "unjust" flings at his brethren. We were greatly surprised, as well as humbled, by this rebuke, until we examined our list and found that he is not a reader of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, but had formed his estimate of its Editor by seeing his portrait painted in the columns of an esteemed contemporary!

Editor's Easy Chair.

The year grows old. With whitening locks and shortening days it hastens to its end. Before it goes hence, however, it brings to us one more joyful anniversary. Of all the festivals of the year none is quite so marked with exuberant joy as Christmas. And why not? It celebrates our Saviour's birth. That was the bringing in of good news to a sad and sinking world. At this season the air seems vibrant with the angelic song of "Peace on earth, and good-will among men." The memory of that event, heralded by the music of angels, stirs the heart with emotions which nothing else can excite. Under its benign influence the world grows young, and the heart grows tender. Old and young alike give it a glad welcome. To the one it opens the mystic door of memory, and to the other the bright door of hope. To all it brings a sense of mystery and a feeling of awe, when we stop to think how heaven and earth, how God and man, came together on that eventful night of the long ago. Let us see to it that we do stop to think of the sublime event which the day commemorates, and to ask ourselves whether we understand its vast significance to the race. It was God coming into humanity in a new and deeper sense, to change the course of human history, and to purify all the streams of human life. It was opening up a channel for the river of God, which, flowing down from the everlasting hills, would forever gladden with flowers and fruitage the desert wastes of the world.

We think of Christ, at this season of the year, not so much as a great Teacher, nor as the Lamb of God, offering himself a sacrifice for us, nor yet as our coronated King, reigning over his loyal subjects. We think of him, rather, as the Christ-child—as the Babe of Bethlehem. Childhood is always interesting and fascinating. Heaven seems to bend a little closer to the earth in the presence of a little child. As Wordsworth expresses it, "Heaven lies all about us in our infancy." This is true of the most ordinary child. How much more true must it have been with that wonderful Child, whose birth introduced a new era in the life of mankind! Here the "trailing clouds of glory" were visible even to shepherds' eyes. Who can guess what vast possibilities slumber in the brain and heart of any babe? What dreams have come into the mother-heart through all time as she has gazed upon the face of her sleeping child! But Mary, mother of the Christ-child, had reason, above all women, to ponder in her heart what should be the mission and destiny of her wonderful Babe. Had not the angel told her before the birth of her child, "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Most High: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end"? Was that not enough to awaken the fondest hopes and the highest imaginings in her mother-heart? And yet, even Mary did not, and could not, rise to a full understanding of all that was involved in this message of the angel. Nor have we.

Among the lessons of the Christmas season, then, is this—the sacredness of childhood. If heaven lies all about the infant that is committed to us; if the little child is such an embryonic organization of mental and spiritual possibilities, as to enshrine the divine, how softly and reverently we should demean ourselves towards one of these little ones, and how carefully we should train it so that it may develop into all that it was intended to be! It is this that makes the home a sacred place, a holy spot, a training school for young immortals, whose lives and whose destines are to be in a measure determined by the influences which mould them in the home. The fact that Jesus Christ was once a little child makes every child in the land more sacred and more valuable in its undeveloped potentialities. The home, the Bible school, the Church—these are the great agencies used of God for training the young after the pattern of Christ, and bringing them to share in his divine nature. And so it is that the incarnation sanctifies all life and lifts every human being into new dignity, and clothes life itself with a new meaning and value. The present revival of interest in the function of teaching, and especially in our Sunday Bible schools, is but one of the evidences that we are learning to place the Master's estimate upon a child. Well will it be for the church if this Christmastide shall impress upon us anew the lesson which Jesus taught when he placed a little child in the midst of his disciples and made it a type of those who should enter into his kingdom. Well will it be for the church, for the state, and for the welfare of humanity, if this homage we are paying to the Christ-child, born in Bethlehem nineteen centuries ago shall lead us to a higher appreciation of all childhood, and to a redoubled diligence in gathering the neglected and untaught little ones into our Bible schools to learn of him whose birth we celebrate.

Fill the little stockings, then, which childhood faith has hung empty by the fireside. Disturb not their confidence in the kind and gracious spirit which visits alike the palace and the hovel on Christmas Eve, with its token of good-will. Fill the home with Christmas cheer and happy greetings, and these bright childhood memories will be recalled in the coming days, when the little feet, whose empty stockings pleaded so eloquently for presents, shall have wandered far from the old homestead and the parental roof. They will form a link in the chain of influences that will serve to bind the wandering ones to childhood faith and innocence. Poor, indeed, is the life that has no sunny spots back in childhood's day, to which it can look with tender yearnings when the storms of life beat piteously upon it. Happy is he, who, as he glances backward along the track of the years, can recount many happy Christmases reaching back through the dim halls of memory to tenderest childhood, associated with the family fireside, with a mother's love, with a father's care, and with the sweet associations of brothers and sisters, in the loved family circle. That family circle may long since have been broken by death, or the loved ones may be scattered far and wide; but when Christmas comes and when the firelight from the Yule-log flickers on the walls at twilight, we recall the faces and forms, the scenes and the associations, of those by-gone days, and live over again the blessed period of childhood. Blessed be the season whose magic power can help us to realize the poetic prayer:

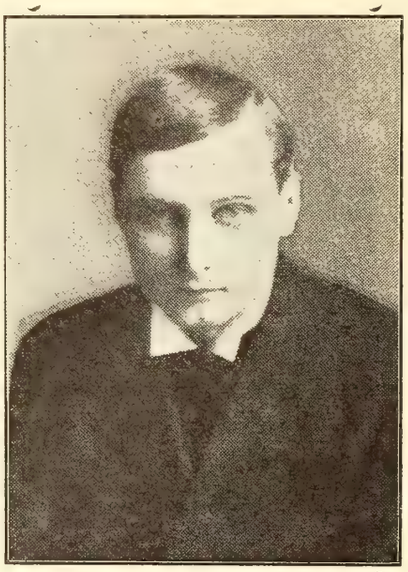
"Backward, turn backward, O Time, in your flight!
Make me a child again, just for to-night!"

To-night we are having the first snow of the season that is worth counting. For the sake of the boys and girls who always wish for a "white Christmas" we hope the present carpet of "the beautiful" may be preserved until this great children's festival has arrived, or that a fresh new one may be laid for the occasion. It seems much more like a real Christmas when the dull earth is covered and the trees are laden with the white crystals manufactured in the upper air to beautify the world, and when the merry jingle of sleigh bells is heard on the wintry air, and happy voices ring out as the sleigh speeds along:

"O here we go o'er the fleecy snow,
And the moonbeams sparkle round,
And the hoofs keep time to the music's chime,
As merrily on we bound, we bound!"

How the hearts of the little ones bound with joy at the sight of the feathery flakes of snow sifting down through the air on Christmas eve, dancing and whirling about the lamp posts before they descend to the earth! And how difficult it is for them to go to sleep when they go to bed! When they do yield to slumber it is to dream of the fur-clad, fat faced, jolly old man with the sled and reindeers loaded down with the treasures of toydom. Grudge not the little ones these innocent joys and wonder-waking mysteries that lie along the border-land of fact and fancy. All too soon their hearts must feel life's burdens and cares, and they shall sigh for the beauty, poetry and mystery of life which filled their childhood days with happiness.

A Christmas Garden for the Heart.



By Frank Waller Allen

"Their soul shall be as a watered garden."

A garden, if it be your own, is a plot of earth where you may sow whatever pleases you. If you are thoughtful, you plant solely with the idea of what the garden is going to bring to you, with, perhaps, a trifle extra here-and-there for friendship's sake. . . It is true, that there is much pleasure to be gotten out of tilling the soil and covering-over the seed, but nevertheless the chief end is in the harvesting when the mid-summer sun has ripened and mellowed.

You plant your garden in the first wholesome days of the springtime, that the seed may have time to rot, to sprout, to grow, to flower, to bear. If you planted it later there would be danger of a drouth, or of a frost before the blossoming time. And it seems that God has arranged this with your comfort in view, for it is so much easier and enjoyable to work in the fresh pregnant soil of the April days.

When you are planning you usually do not want it altogether a flower garden, for a man needs must eat; nor do you wish it all vegetables, for it is as necessary to feed one's soul as well as one's stomach. However, you plant enough of things eatable to give strength to the body, and, because the spirit is of vastly greater importance than the physical, you sow all of the rest, large or small, with flowers for the heart's sake. . . And you merely sow seed in the earth, and you reap a garden.

The garden of life, if your will be your own, is your mind where you may sow whatever pleases you. And, as in the garden of earth, you should plant solely with the idea of what your garden is going to bring you and your friends. This garden of your mind should be planted in the first wholesome days of youth. You do this that the seed-thought may have time to sprout, blossom and bear fruit.

You do not want your mind altogether a flower-garden. There are practical problems in the work of to-day which must needs be dealt with calmly, justly and without dreams and fancy-spinning; nor do you want it altogether in the commonplace, for the soul is ever a poet. There should be enough of the vegetable in the mind to cope with the affairs of mere living; but the rest should be planted in flowers of kindness, mercy and love, for the heart's treasury.

And you sow merely seed-thought in the mind, while you reap a garden in the heart. Once upon a time a great man closed a timely homily, very practical and yet filled with poetry, by saying: "Think on these things." Thinking is cultivating the frail eager sprouts, and helping them on their way to the air, the sun and the harvest. It is a function of the mind, and not of the heart which acts more or less unconsciously . . . Planting in the earth is an act which is done consciously; the growth steals upward even to flowering and ripening, and no man knows when . . . So to think upon is to cultivate and train the seed sown in the mind.

Now a Christmas garden, among many beautiful things, has within it, a grave. It is nothing gruesome, I assure you, but like many dear old gardens of the South, it has rue and rosemary bedecking it that a memory may be kept green and sweet. A

A CHRISTMAS PRAYER.

ON storied Judah's sacred hills
A joyous cry was heard,
"A king is born in Bethlehem;"
All men took up the word.
Unto the lowly manger crib
Came peasant, seer and king,
And bending low, by love inspired,
Brought each his offering.

O Saviour, on this Christmas Day
Our gifts we bear to Thee;
No gold, no frankincense and myrrh
We bring on bended knee.
Our minds we bring, to make them Thine;
Our hearts, to learn Thy love;
Our hands—O that they ever, Lord,
Obedient may prove!

The Season's Message.

By James Egbert.

What does the Christ-child bring? The Memoried Year. Not overjoyous, nor yet bitter, only precious it lingers,—

A changing sky of gray and blue,
Of midnight's black and noonday's glory.

Loved Faces long gone, still not lost, neither unfelt; Spells of Silent Longing, yet not empty, nor utterly lonely, rather rare seasons of fond companionship; Long Days of Struggle with faint gleams of triumph still o'ershadowed by towering ideals,—yet one looks aback the year as from a height.

What does the Christ-child bring? Out of the checkered year, rife with failure and heavy with unuttered yearning, the Christ-child brings A Man, as the potter from the fragments, a vase; A New Creation like unto himself, Son of God and Son of Man; strong, courageous, ready, —though one looks as from a valley toward the unscaled heights.

What does the Christ-child bring? Radiant with opportunity, Another Year with Days breathing of possibility and Hours glad with promise. A Vision of Service splendid in fruitful fields bursting with joy and harvest.

Enclasping all, as from another world, A Halo bright with hope. This the Christ-child brings To Me as I stand with open mind and pondering heart amid the years.

May he bring the like To You, and your Christmas be A Merry Minstrel, your New Year One Grand Symphony of happy days.

Kipton, O.

The Birth of the King.

By W. S. Lowe.

Miracles preceded, accompanied, and followed the birth of the King of kings, yet all had direct reference to this "divine event toward which all creation moves."

Notice these wonderful manifestations in which divinity sought to articulate his love for humanity.

There was, first, the announcement to Zacharias of the birth of John the Baptist; then the dumbness of Zacharias, whose lips were sealed by doubt and later opened by faith; then the conception and birth of this child by Elizabeth, who had been barren and was now "well stricken in years"; then, preceding the birth of John, comes the annunciation of the angel to Mary, followed by the miraculous conception, and the vision to Joseph; finally, immediately following the birth of Jesus, the heavens open again and the angelic choir fills the air with the song of the nativity, the melody of which is still ringing across the centuries.

Here then are seven golden links in that chain of love with which God is seeking to "bring back" to his throne his wayward children.

In this we behold the realization of the song of the Psalmist:

"Mercy and truth are met together; Righteousness and peace have kissed each other. Truth springeth out of the earth; And righteousness hath looked down from heaven."

Paola, Kan.

sort of lovable sorrow which has lost pain, which was but the travail at the birth of tenderness and fine sympathy. . Well, in this grave within this garden of the Christmas heart, lies buried all our bitterness toward life, our ugliness of spirit shown our friends, and all of our own disappointments which once made us forget the suffering of the world about us, and they are but memories of a dead self. The rue keeps us from becoming too triumphant in the enjoyment of the harvesting; the rosemary is, as always, for remembrance.

In the Christmas garden there are three blossoms which are far sweeter and more beautiful than all of the others, and they are these:

The thoughtful care for the happiness of little children that they may know the fulness of this glad season. Let there be no pitiful empty stockings and cheerless hearths on this wondrous day when the angels of our Father heralded the birth of him whose heart was ever that of a child. . . Blessed are they who remember to make happy the lives of little children.

Then there is the joy you have given by remembering the loneliness of those who have grown old, becoming children for a second time and now missing the familiar faces of playmates of other days.

Blessed are they in whose garden blossoms loving kindness for those who have out-lived youth's activities, and find themselves unheeded and alone.

Now comes the secret of the Life which is the cause of all the beauty, all the strength, all the love. It is to have tenderly remembered that lonely little stranger born in a stable in Bethlehem over nineteen hundred years ago.

Thus, when friends and strangers pass lingeringly and look in your heart, as they breathe the perfume here, and there pluck a flower for good cheer and strength's sake, "their souls shall be as watered gardens."

Our Watchword, "Forward," By T. W. Bellingham

This is an age of progress. The universal cry everywhere is forward, and to this end men bend their energies with renewed vigor to the development and unfolding of truth.

Along the lines of higher education there are decided improvements in pursuing methods which bring about better results than heretofore. Society is being moulded to-day by trained and active minds, who are not satisfied with creeds and statements of the past without fully investigating and using God-given reason, which is sanctioned by the great Author of life, who has said: "Come now and let us reason together."

No previous age has witnessed the liberty of conscience that has dawned with the twentieth century. To keep time with the martial strains of advanced thought, the Church, the leavening factor in the world, is stepping forth in her majesty and grandeur, with banners unfurled to the breeze. This is what should be. Because of narrow, contracted views held by some in the church, it is no reason to suppose that others who are working along advanced lines should be considered heterodox. The greatest Teacher, who appeared in the world to lead men into truth, was persecuted largely because of his advanced views theologically. Truth is a flower whose fragrance sweetens human life wherever it is permitted to bloom in its beauty and glory. Hence, when the Saviour advanced thought contrary to the tenets held by the Jewish priesthood, he received at their hands scourging, from their lips scorn and calumny. Creeds of men flourish for a time on prejudice and bigotry, but are destined to perish with advanced thinking. The reason that such men as Galileo suffered at the hands of some in the church was doubtless largely due to the fact that councils had laid down certain rules by which all must think religiously, or perish in the attempt to promulgate their honest opinions. Hence Christ must perish; Stephen suffer martyrdom and Galileo must retract, when truth lies wounded in the house of those who should be her friends; but, crushed to earth, again she rears her stately head, and temples beautiful and grand are built in which she may be worshiped.

It may be possible that finite minds may pass the boundary line of truth in true investigation, and run to extremes in latitudinarianism, but, if honest in research, the pendulum will swing back to its proper place. So, however many dangers there may be in the faith of the investigator, no one should be dismayed or cease the earnest search for truth in forest, field or sky, where nature's God is seen; or fail with spiritual appetite keen to search the "Book Divine." With no fetters on the mind, truth shall be found, and he who expects to find must search, and he who seeks will have no cause for regret. For he who said, "I am the truth," laid down conditions whereby one and all might know the truth, and knowing might be free.

Hand in hand with scientific investigations we must go forward, fearing not what nature's book may yet reveal, for "the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork." A truth discovered in the pages of nature is just as sacred as in any book revealed, for all the good, the beautiful and the pure in this world in which we live emanates from him who rules only in love—the Architect divine, and who is known to us through Jesus the Christ as "Our Father who art in the heavens."

Retribution As Portrayed by the Poets

By Edgar D. Jones

Let the poet preach a sermon from the text, "the wages of sin is death." Mr. Beecher once said that a man, to be a successful preacher, must either tell stories or paint pictures. The poet does the latter strikingly. Out of experience as bitter as gall see him give the red color to the canvas. See poor George Arnold paint the first one:

"I have had my will,
Tasted every pleasure,
I have drunk my fill
Of the purple measure;
Life has lost its zest,
Sorrow is my guest;
Oh, the lees are bitter, bitter,
Let me rest.

"Love once filled the bowl,
Running o'er with blisses,
Made my very soul
Drunk with scarlet kisses;
But I drank it dry,
Love has passed me by;
Oh, the lees are bitter, bitter,
Let me die."

And next, Byron:

"My days are in the yellow leaf,
The flower and fruits of love are gone,
The worm, the canker and the grief
Are mine alone."

See now Burns:

"Pleasures are like poppies spread,
You grasp the flower, its bloom is shed;
Or, like the snowflake in the river,
A moment seen, then lost forever;
Or, like the borealis race,
That flits ere you can paint their face;
Or, like the rainbow's lovely form,
Vanishing amid the storm."

And this from his lines to "A Mountain Daisy":

"Even thou who mourn'st the daisy's fate,
That fate is thine, no distant date;
Stern ruin's ploughshare drives elate
Full on thy bloom,
'Till, crushed beneath the furrow's weight,
Shall be thy doom."

Poe wrought the matter of retribution into nearly everything that he wrote, wrought it in with fantastic and gruesome touch, but perhaps in no place quite so horribly as in the familiar lines:

"Leave my loneliness unbroken!
Quit the bust above my door!
Take thy beak from out my heart;
And take thy form from off my door!
Quoth the raven, Nevermore!"

Goethe, in his short poem, "Vanitas, Vanitatum Vanitas!" tells how he had set his heart on many things, and pursued them solely for the pleasure he might gain. In every instance he was disappointed, until finally he gives himself over to wild abandon and shouts:

"Now I've set my heart upon nothing you see:
Hurrah!
And the whole wide world belongs to me;
Hurrah!
The feast begins to run low, no doubt,
But at the old cask we'll have one good bout;
Come, drink the lees all out."

Centuries ago Koheleth summed up the results of sin and gave us the fruit of his ripe judgment in a picture at once beautiful and restful: "This is the end of the matter; all hath been heard; fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole happiness of man."

A GREAT COMMISSION*

By John E. Pounds

I am to speak in behalf of the organization which provides for the orphans who are homeless and the worthy aged who are without resource

The first fear of the church, and perhaps the greatest one, has been lest the divinity of Jesus should be lost. This would leave Christianity but mortal, and like all mortal things, sentence of death would prevail against it, perhaps before man's allotted time of three-score years and ten.

But it is equally fatal to lose the humanity of Jesus. This loss would take sympathy and fellowship out of religion.

What is true of the Christ is equally true of his earthly body, the church. When the church loses her humanity men grope as in darkness. They have an instinct of sympathy and benevolence, but no guide, no light. It is then that they organize human fraternities, which do something for some, but leave many to suffer and die, while heaven can only weep. I am very jealous for Israel, lest she seem to do even less than the world. In giving evidence of her humanity the Church gives the best evidence of her divinity. I urge the work of the Benevolent Association, because it is an expression, as Jesus' care for his mother was of his own.

I have called the trust which Jesus bestowed upon John—the care of his mother—a great commission.

There are in it three elements:

A great Stewardship;
A great Charity;
A great Compensation.

The STEWARDSHIP is implied in the confidence Jesus had that John would receive Mary. He did not command, he did not even request it of him. He knew that John had heard his teaching concerning money and ownership. Hence he had only to catch the eye of the disciple, and, turning his back to where the suffering woman stood, say, "Behold thy mother!" He felt sure that John would recognize Mary's claim to care and love.

I have not concerned myself to find a command that Christian people should care for the aged and helpless of Jesus' disciples, or for the children left destitute. Like John, we count it a privilege to do this. Every loyal subject puts his home and his means at the disposal of his king.

There are three principles in the doctrine of Christian stewardship:

That what we have is not our own, but is held in trust;

That it is to be used in Christ's name;

That the gift of self must accompany the gift of money.

That what we have is not our own should not require an argument to beings who brought nothing into this world and just as certainly can take nothing out of it. There are no pockets in a shroud. The man in the parable who pulled down his barn that he might build greater, Jesus called a fool. Why? Because he had great possessions? Certainly not, but because he was too fond of the possessive pronoun. He talked of "my barns," "my fruits," "my goods." "I will say to my soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years." He died that night, and then whose were these things—his? Poor fool, he thought he could satisfy his soul with cold, lifeless gold!

The hard thing for the true Christians is, not to accept the doctrine of stewardship, but to decide how to administer the trust. How much for the education of self and children, how much for the adornment of home, that may be a real home, how much for a support in old age, and how much for the pressing needs of Christ's people—that is the real question. But some high-born souls will let the measure dip toward sacrifice—will deal more generously with the Lord than even with themselves.

Does this thought of providing for the poor make void the doctrine of work—that a man shall eat bread in the sweat of his face? Rather it emphasizes it, by giving a double reason for it—that a man shall work for his own bread and for that of another. There is no place in the plan of God for a lazy man.

Eternal is the ban against the idle. And remember that idling at Newport or in a private yacht is just as vulgar and contemptible as sitting on a dry-goods box in front of a country store!

The second principle of Christian stewardship is that money entrusted to us should be used in Jesus' name—which means that we shall spend it so as to further his cause while we feed his children. Nowhere did Jesus teach that money was an end in itself, but always that it is to be used for the formation of a character like his own. God makes all of us as rich as he dares, and in his anxiety to have us give to the poor and untaught of earth makes some richer than is good for them. The great value of money is that it may be turned into men.

When we give to a non-Christian home for children or for the aged we fulfill the first principle of stewardship—that what we have is to be shared with others. But when we give to a Christian institution we fulfill the second principle also—teaching and saving the children while we feed them. If he who kills the soul is more to be dreaded than he who kills the body, then worthy of double honor is he who feeds both body and soul. A garment is better if a Dorcas sews a sermon into every seam.

The third principle of our stewardship makes it really Christian—that self accompanies the gift. The money the Good Samaritan left with the innkeeper was but a small part of what he gave to the injured man. The priest and the Levite might have been willing to give two-pence; but the trouble and care and danger and the burden of caring for a sick man's future were the things they denied him. Some rich men who write checks for the poor, and do no more, may make the acquaintance of the priest and the Levite in the time to come, and talk the matter over with them! But the true stewardship means giving something of love and life with every gift.

Besides stewardship there is very plainly in my text the doctrine of Charity. John was to give Mary a home. In this act there are all the elements of Christian charity, which differs from that of the world in some important particulars:

For one thing, it is more sensitive. It hears the cry of need even from afar. Mary had not asked for a home, did not think of her need of one. But Jesus thought of it.

"Do you hear the children weeping, O my brothers,
Ere the sorrow comes with years?

* * * * * * * *

They are weeping in the playtime of the others,
In the country of the free."

There are families in every community that would relieve need if they could see it, or if they could hear its cry. It is possible that one reason Dives was condemned was that he did not know how hungry Lazarus really was. The Rich Young Man probably had relieved the distress that presented itself before him, for rich Jews did this. But when told to sell his possessions and give to poor people whom he did not know, he went away sorrowful. Moses said to Hobab, "You shall be eyes for us in this wilderness." The Benevolent Associations are eyes for the church, to see the need of those whom Christ loves.

Again, Christian Charity is more sympathetic than that of the world. It transforms charity into fellowship, giving into dividing. It makes it a give-and-take affair. With one hand it gives a share, with the other it takes away the sense of shame. It has been said that he who gives promptly gives twice. But he who gives sympathetically gives thrice—he gives food for to-day's need, he gives faith for to-morrow's battle; he gives friendship for all time.

Another important element of Christian charity is its sanity. It helps the needy to help themselves. The best charity is to prevent the need of charity.

What can be done for a child? I mean for any child? What can rich men give their children? Three things only—care, love and a chance.

Christian charity must give all these. The child must have care. Our real mother-tongue—the only language we are born with—is a cry for help. If receiving care in childhood is charity, then we are all paupers. Nor is our condition in old age more independent. If the rich man lives to old age others will gird him and lead him whither they will. But the abasement of man is most abject when he is hungry. I once saw a hungry child. She asked me for bread. Her thin, pale face, her too bright eye, told how real was her need. When I gave her food and saw the look of a wild beast come into her face as she battled herself as to whether she should eat it or take home and divide with those there, I learned to have respect for every organization that feeds hungry children. And when I saw her win the battle and go away without having taken one small bite, I thought I understood why Jesus said that to give bread in his name is worthy a reward.

*An address [abbreviated] in behalf of the National Benevolent Association, at the General Christian Missionary Convention, Norfolk, Va., October 16, 1907.

But the helpless need more than care. They need love. A Christian orphanage has the poetry and songs left in. Love changes it from an institution into a home.

An objection is sometimes raised at this point. We are told that it is better to put children into private homes than into public homes or orphanages. The point is well taken. I think no one will question it for a moment. But what kind of homes—Christian or worldly? And shall the church select the homes or the state?

The third thing it is possible to give a child is a chance. This, perhaps, includes the love and care of which I have spoken, for all one can really have in this world is a chance. Sometimes a man says he is going to give his son an education. But he can not do this. He might give him a dollar, or a book, or perchance a kick, but not an education. He can give him a chance to get an education. Napoleon said of a certain man, who had lost him an important province, "I made him a king, but I could not make him a general." We boast of the power of the franchise, but can we make a man a statesman, or even a president? We can give him a chance to be President.

How is the Church to excuse herself to those who have never had their rightful chance for Christian nurture? It is hard to overestimate the importance of teaching the young. Not many brands can be saved from a burning building; not much treasure rescued from a shipwrecked cargo. And what is saved is injured by the fire and the water. It is better to keep a child good than to restore him after he has known sin. For prevention is better than cure.

I have suggested that there is in the scripture which I read a hint of compensation. He who receives a little child or an aged saint into his home will have more heaven than he had before.

But the saddest things of earth may not be of God's intention. For there is a child for every empty heart and loving arms for every motherless child. One knows not which most calls forth our pity, the empty arms or the unfondled tresses. The society that brings the two together blesses both and will itself be blessed. And could all the lonely hearts and all the unloved orphans be united, there would be joy in heaven for the space of seven hours.

What, then, shall our answer be to the suffering Christ to-day? For he still shares the pain and tears of his own. As he looks at the needy saints who have grown feeble in his service, and at the little ones who need both earthly and heavenly nurture, does he not say, "Beloved disciples, behold your father, your mother, your children?" And shall not each answer, "Behold, Lord, not my money only, but my care, my love, my home from this hour!"

The Forgotten Secret. By W. J. Dawson. Price, 50 cents net. Fleming H. Revell Co.

It was Sir Oliver Lodge, the well-known scientist, who recently declared prayer to be the forgotten secret of the church. Mr. Dawson has taken this thought and given us a delightful monograph of 63 pages. His conclusion is that to him who has found the secret life takes a new significance and faith receives a new sanction. We have, he declares, but to make the experiment of prayer to discover its eternal efficacy.

The Religion of Cheerfulness. By Sarah A. Hubbard. A. C. McClurg & Co.

With such a text as "Every man is an optimist who sees deep enough," we have here a charming plea for the same view of life and some good counsel as to how to practice the religion of cheerfulness. A dainty volume in a board case.

Christ's Secret of Happiness. By Lyman Abbott. Price from 75 cents to $1.50 net, according to binding. T. Y. Crowell & Co.

Dr. Abbott says there are three kinds of happiness: Pleasure, joy and blessedness. They are not inconsistent, and his little book is a trumpet call to us to have them all. More Children's Books

Two Royal Foes. By Eva Madden. pp. 303. The McClure Co.

An unusual story. The two foes are Queen Louisa, of Prussia, and Napoleon. So that the book has an historical interest apart from its merits as a story for young people.

The Russian Fairy Book," translated by Nathan Haskell Dole. 8vo. Cloth, $2. T. Y. Crowell & Co.

One hardly associates the steppes of Russia with fairies, but rather classes its people with those whose imagination has, by want and hardship, been crushed. But here is a real fairy story book, with all the parties that are necessary to satisfy the childish mind. Magicians and witches, princes and little boys and little girls figure in the young people's minds of the land of the Great Bear as they do in the minds of our children in America. Mr. Dole has done his translating work with that care that preserves the spirit of romance. The book is well illustrated in colors by N. Bilibin, and this will prove a very acceptable gift among the season's novelties.

"The Adventures of Merrywink." By Christina Gowans Whyte. 8vo. Cloth $2. Thomas Y. Crowell Company.

This book won the prize of $500 offered by "The Bookman" of London, for the best illustrated story book for little children. This statement in itself puts the stamp of merit on this new fairy story, for it is a new fairy story, and that is saying much. It tells about a little boy fairy of the gleaming star, and how he fulfilled the prediction that he would one day be king of Fairyland. The drawings, which add much to the attractiveness of the fascinating letter press, are by M. V. Wheelhouse. The book will certainly have a large sale.

Any book reviewed in these columns (except "net" books) will be sent postpaid by The Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis, on receipt of the published price. For "net" books, add ten per cent for postage.

Our Budget

—"Merry Christmas" to all our readers!

—May it bring real happiness to every household and hearthstone!

—"Peace on earth and good will" among all our newspaper contemporaries! May their prosperity be commensurate with their usefulness to Christ's cause.

—A free pardon to all who may have wronged us, consciously or otherwise, with a request for a like dispensation of mercy toward ourselves.

—We ought to be as careful to avoid offending one of Christ's weakest followers as we are to avoid doing injury to Christ himself, for inasmuch as we have done it unto one of the least of these, we have done it unto Christ.

—Pay up your church dues, your missionary pledges and your subscription to THE CHRSTIAN-EVANGELIST, and clear the deck for action during the year 1908. Let us make it a year of great peace and progress all along the line of our varied activities.

—"The fullest and most satisfactory account of the National Convention this year falls easily to the credit of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST."—Christian Monthly.

This, however, is no exceptional thing. It would be a matter of surprise if this should fail to be true any year.

—The victory may depend on you.

—We have in hand another address by a prominent Baptist preacher on the subject of union between Baptists and Disciples. It is by Dr. Frank M. Goodchild, and was read before the Baptist Ministerial Association of Greater New York. This we hope to publish, as well as other interesting matter relating to the union question.

—In another column we report the destruction of the beautiful little church at Mobile, Ala. We are not quite sure how much insurance can be secured. The cost of the building, we believe, was in the neighborhood of $10,000.

—At Christmas time it is well to think of the poor and needy. We bespeak for the message by John L. Pounds on another page, a careful reading. It is the substance of his fine address before our National Convention on behalf of the orphans. Our Benevolent Association needs your spare cents and dollars. Think of the little ones at the Christmas tide.

—In another column we print a communication from W. M. Taylor on "New Orleans and Our Convention." Brother Taylor is enthusiastic and writes with all the fervid glow of a southerner. We are glad to know that his work in the Crescent City is moving along nicely, and that the prospect is as bright as noon-day. He encourages THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to bring a party down the river, so that we may "storm the fort from land and water, with infantry, cavalry and marines."

I Want To Tell You

about $30.00 worth of the very finest high-grade books which you can secure for only $10.00. Sounds improbable? It is really true. I am not talking about "trashy" books, gotten up on poor paper and in cheap binding, but of books which are among the best in the English language and are first class in the matter of paper, printing and binding. Can arrange terms.

These books are no ordinary bargain. A postal card addressed to me will bring the information, and if what I tell you does not interest you, you need go no further.

—Wm. Ross Lloyd has written to us in complimentary terms of the work of E. T. Edmonds at Ft. Smith, Ark. Besides his special church work our pastor there has built up a fine Chautauqua which is a blessing to Ft. Smith.

—Work at Altoona, Pa., under Charles E. Smith, moves forward. The debt has been reduced to a little over $1,100. The annual meeting will be followed by a protracted meeting, which, by request of the church, will be led by the minister.

Brother Craig has just been elected president for the ensuing year.

—S. H. Bartlett has had a house-warming at the new parsonage of the church at Painesville, Ohio. There were more than two hundred in attendance. A feature of the occasion was a present to the pastor, in appreciation of his good work, of a handsome Thesaurus. This congregation is preparing for a great Pinkerton-Saxton meeting in January.

Continue with great interest.—Harley Jackson, minister."

—We regret to learn that our beloved brother, S. C. Toof, of Memphis, Tenn., suffered a nervous attack as he was on the point of leaving the church on Tuesday, December 3. This temporarily disabled him and quite alarmed his friends. He was taken home in a carriage and received careful medical attention. His physician thought he would be out in a few days. A later report indicates that he was just holding his own.

—P. A. Sherman and wife, of Wisconsin, go to India. They will reach their destination early in January. Mr. Sherman is a graduate of Hiram, and has successfully served the church at Rib Lake, Wis. Since the National Convention the Foreign Society has sent out eight new missionaries. This is a good start on the fifty that is proposed to be sent out this year. A number of others are under favorable consideration for appointment.

A Fifty Year Test.

The many attempts during the past fifty years to improve upon the standard of all infant foods—Borden's Eagle Brand Condensed Milk—have been in vain. Eagle Brand is prepared under rigid sanitary conditions. As an infant food its equal is unattainable.

CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING CO.,
St. Louis, Mo.

—Bethany College Y. W. C. A. is preparing a beautiful calendar, containing views of the college. This ought to be in every church. See the advertisement for particulars.

—A holiday gift? Thomas Curtis Clark's little volume of poems, from the press of the Christian Publishing Company, is ready at your order. It will bring the right kind of cheer.

—In view of the Christmas holidays THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST must go to press early for its next edition.

—We have in hand from the officials of Christian University and the Bible College of Missouri a communication stating that these two institutions in the future are to work cordially in harmony. We hope to find space for a fuller announcement.

—An important notice, affecting all our subscribers, appears on our last page. There has been a new ruling at the Post Office department which affects the relationship of newspaper publishers and the readers of all periodicals. This new order is in the interest both of the post office, the publisher, and the subscriber. It means, in a sentence, that a publisher cannot give as lengthy a credit as some readers of papers have taken in the past. As publishers we cannot help ourselves, for the government has ruled that we must have our subscribers pay up within a definite period. We trust they will at once see the propriety of assisting us, not only to pay our own bills, but to keep within the government regulations. After all, it is easier to pay once a year for a paper which costs less than three cents a week than to wait several years to settle the account.

—John L. Andrews is to enter the field on behalf of the Hot Springs church. We bespeak for him a hearing.

—Ben F. Hill, who has just held a fine meeting at Brookfield, Mo., for Brother Prunty and his church, writes: "Keep your eye on them. The church there is going to go forward." This we can well believe.

—Ellis B. Harris closed his work at Sheridan, Wyo., with a week's meeting, which was held at the request of the brethren there. He regrets to leave that field, but believes he will be more useful in evangelistic work. He is at Prescott, Wash., this month, and Edna Earl Horse is singing for him.

—Every department of the work at Palmyra, Mo., is growing and Clarence E. Wagner has reason to rejoice. The Bible school is more than doubled, a Junior Christian Endeavor has been organized, and an effort is being made to have fifty seniors by January 1. The offering for Church Extension amounted to over $52 and for State Missions over $45.

—George A. Jones, who has been pastor of the Fourth Christian Church of Cincinnati, Ohio, for the past twenty-two months, takes the work at Ludlow, Ky., January 1. Robert Anderson, an Elder, commends Brother Jones and reports that much has been accomplished since he entered this field. He looks for great progress at Ludlow.

—F. A. Scott is closing two years of ministry with the Belle Plain church, at La Rose, Ill. He reports all departments in a prosperous condition. A successor is wanted to take his place at once. He says that it is in many respects an inviting field, and that the salary paid is adequate, especially when one considers the genuine hospitality of the people.

—We are in receipt of a letter from L. V. Taft, of Washington, D. C., enclosing some subscriptions for the renewal of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. He says that he helped to put in type the first number of "The Evangelist," printed in 1849 at Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, edited by Daniel Bates and assisted by Aaron Chatterton. He afterwards followed the paper to Fort Madison, Iowa. Even away back there, he says, the paper had about 5,000 circulation.

—Evangelist O. P. Spiegel has just concluded a short meeting at the First Christian Church St. Louis, John L. Brandt, pastor. He was assisted by Horace Geiger, singing evangelist. Both these workers gave satisfaction and the effect of their labor was the upbuilding of the membership and fifty-one additions to the church, about thirty-five, we believe, being by confession. Brother Spiegel went from St. Louis to a family reunion, and will later evangelize on the Pacific coast, where we are confident he will do good work for our cause.

—Wm. G. McColley, the secretary of the Fourth District of Illinois, has resigned at Pontiac, but will remain by request of the congregation, until a suitable field opens. He has had sixteen years' experience in ministerial work, five in his present pastorate. He is a graduate of Butler College. Every department has doubled during his work in Pontiac, while the Bible school has trebled. The property increase has been from $2,000 to a plant of $16,000, with a debt remaining of only $2,000.

—L. B. Haskins, who has resigned at Erlanger, Ky., after a four years' ministry, has the joy of knowing that during this time the membership of the church has increased 150 per cent, while the population of the town has grown 15 per cent. The congregation has averaged one dollar per member annually for missions, and paid off something like $3,000 indebtedness. The Bible school has doubled in average attendance. Brother Hill goes to take charge of the work at the Twenty-fifth Street Church of Church, Baltimore, Md., the first Lord's day in January.

—Roscoe C. Hill, writing from Matanzas, Cuba, says: "We had a fine convention of the young peoples' societies and Sunday schools of the different churches in the Island November 27-29. About 200 delegates were present. The program was mainly by young Cubans, who, though for the most part only babes in the Christian life, acquitted themselves nobly. The convention marked an epoch in Protestant missions in Cuba. We had nine delegates from Matanzas, and they have returned home enthusiastic for work."

—Roy O. Miller has had a successful year with the West Jefferson Street Church, Fort Wayne, Ind. He was recently given a vote of confidence by his official board. There have been 50 added during the year at the regular services, and a debt of $1,100 on current expenses paid off. The Bible school attendance reached 206 last Sunday. The C. W. B. M. was on its Honor Roll for the first time. Things are full of hope for 1908. Brother Miller writes: "I await with interest each issue of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and am looking for the articles on 'Present Day Problems.'"

—On another page we give some account of the handsome new building at Beatrice, Neb. F. M. Rains says this is one of the best buildings west of the Missouri River. It has a symmetry and facilities that make it exceptionally attractive. The whole property is valued at $60,000. On dedication day there were at Bible school 847 pupils, and the day's victories were crowned by the church becoming a "living link" in the Foreign Society. This is the second foreign missionary sent out by this church in the last two years. F. M. Rains did great work here as a dedicator.

—Newell L. Sims has tendered his resignation at Carthage, Mo., to take effect April 1, or as soon as the congregation can secure another minister. He prefers to be released at once, owing to the illness of his wife at the home of her parents in Payne, Ohio, and his desire to be with her. Mrs. Sims has spent most of her time with her parents during her husband's ministrations at Carthage. He has been pastor there for three years, and during his stay the congregation has prospered. It has advanced especially in its missionary interest, and supports two living links—Dr. Widdowson at Bolengi, Africa, and David Greer in Oklahoma.

—T. J. Golightly has resigned at Bethany, Mo., and will preach his farewell sermon there the last of January. He has not yet chosen another field.

nor has his successor been selected. This is the second time he has resigned this church, and at the unanimous request of the board he reconsidered the first resignation, and was asked to do so this time. He will leave the church in fine condition. There have been eighty-five additions in his eighteen months' ministry, and $700 per year more for missions than ever before. The church has now become a living link in the Foreign Society, and supports Mrs. O. J. Grainger, of Jubbulpore, India. Last year its offering for missions was about $1,000. The board has passed resolutions commendatory of Bro. Golightly, who can now consider another field.

—Percy M. Kendall, whose picture appears on another page, has received from Brother Idleman, whose work in Des Moines he has been assisting, a fine commendation as he returns to the evangelistic field. "We are," says the editorial in the "Christian Worker, "one, as a church, in this expression of gratitude and good will. We esteem it a privilege to have had Brother and Sister Kendall with us for a year, and have been inspired to greater service by them. The unselfish motives which animated their every act seem inexpressibly good to us. Their varied talents which they brought to us are rare, and all we can say is, that wherever they go they carry the loving gratitude of the Central Church and a united prayer for their greatest success." We note that Deloss Smith is to take charge of the music of the Central Church. He and Brother Idleman were college friends and have been closely associated through the years since in evangelistic meetings. He is to have a studio in Des Moines.

—Edward Wilkerson, one of the elders of the Union Avenue Christian Church, and a well-known citizen, who has lived here in St. Louis and been identified with its business interests for more than half a century, departed this life at the residence of his son-in-law, R. D. Patterson, on December second. Brother Wilkerson was greatly loved by those who knew him, both in and out of the church, for his upright walk, for his consistent Christian life, and for his ministrations to the poor and needy. He had just celebrated his eightieth birthday, but up till recently was a regular attendant at the services of the church, where he was greatly esteemed by his brethren. The funeral services occurred at the residence of R. D. Patterson on Thursday, December 5, and were conducted by Dr. J. M. Philputt, the pastor. A large number of people were present to show their sympathy with the bereaved and to express their love and appreciation of the deceased.

The list of schools with the number in each class follows: Crescent Hill 5, South Louisville 7, Boston 12, Lawrenceburg 50, Burgin 9, Latonia 50, Ludlow 13, Butler 6, Cynthiana 11, Frankfort 40, Sadieville 14, Richmond (Second) 10, London 12, Brooksville 16, Ashland 30, Owensboro 19, Princeton 10, Hazel Green 12, Pembroke 3, Roaring Springs 5.

Burning of the Mobile Church.

We have received word from Claude E. Hill that the beautiful little church at Mobile, Ala., has been gutted by fire. No particulars as to how it originated are to hand, but it appears that the organ is a complete wreck, the back end of the church burned from the cellar up, the roof destroyed in several places, the art-glass windows all broken and the ceiling in the main church, while not materially damaged, very much blackened by the smoke. The loss is estimated at about $8,000, which, it is hoped, will be covered by the insurance. Brother Hill writes: "We are all broken up. It is a hard blow to our work, but God will take care of us. We are using the Jewish Temple, recently completed at a cost of $80,000, and only one block away from our church. We will repair as soon as the insurance is adjusted." We understand that those owning the Lyric Theater, as well as the Y. M. C. A. committee, tendered the use of their buildings to the congregation for Sunday services.

Another Annuity for the Home Society.

The Home Board has received another annuity. A small one, it is true, but coming early in the year and close upon the heels of two others, it is full of encouragement. The society, as is well known, pays interest upon the gift until the death of the donor, when the title to the money rests absolutely with the society. This manner of giving is preferable to that of a legacy, in that it is not open to the attacks of dissatisfied heirs. The giver moreover has the added privilege of administering upon at least a portion of his estate before his death. A little leaflet upon the annuity plan may be obtained from the American Christian Missionary Society, Y. M. C. A. building, Cincinnati, O.

A Word from Missoula.

The Missoula Christian Church had a fine harvest home service. The house was packed to the doors. During the following week efforts were made by representatives of three of the leading churches in the city to take our singer away from us. They failed, leaving me still a believer in humanity and Christian comity. Had they gotten him I am not sure what my attitude would have been. When I heard of the effort I had a larger appetite for a "scalp" than I had for Thanksgiving turkey for a little while. In March next this church will engage with Victor Dorris in evangelistic services.

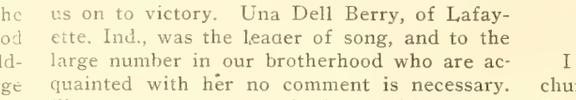
THE CHURCH AT SHELBY, OHIO, AND ITS MEETING

During the past few weeks God has been with us in a most gracious way. It has been impressed upon our minds and hearts most indelibly that our Father is a God of law, and not a capricious God. We have realized as never before that whenever any people are willing to fulfill the conditions; to pay the cost in earnest, intelligent and consecrated effort, the Lord of the Harvest will gladly open the windows of heaven and pour out a blessing which surpasses the hopes of the most sanguine. There is no magic method for gaining the results. Commonplace, old-fashioned hard work, mixed with a large quantity of faithful, obstinate prayer, is the only recipe which finds favor with God. Well has Goodell said, "The atmosphere is filled with Pentecosts that never came down because there was no place for the cloven tongues to rest. * * * We are not waiting on God; God is waiting on us." God stands ready, yea, anxious to do his part; he but waits for us to fulfill the conditions whereby he may act.

The signal success which has been achieved by God's people in Shelby is most phenomenal when one remembers the difficulties encountered. Among all the religious bodies of Ohio, Shelby is known as a proverbially hard field. Strifes, contentions, and all sorts of unpleasant conditions have singularly prevailed in all the churches. This fact, combined with the general spirit of indifference and ungodliness among all classes of people, made the situation an unusually difficult one.



When the writer was called to the pastorate here, the first suggestion made to the official board was that we prepare for a great evangelistic campaign. Almost two years had elapsed since the last meeting, and although two of the best evangelists of our brotherhood had been secured, the results fell far below all expectations. The price of success had not been paid. The people were bound by precedent. They still hugged the unfruitful past, and lost faith in large things. Organization was most imperative at the start. Preparation of six months for a great evangelistic effort was begun, in which faith in big things was encouraged and instilled into the whole congregation. Recognizing the Bible school as the most tangible source of enthusiasm, the chief emphasis was placed on that department of the church. During the two months previous to the campaign, every service was flavored with the evangelistic spirit and pointed unmistakably to the oncoming battle with indifference and sin. The church performed its part well and God sent us two of his choicest workers to lead us on to victory. Una Dell Berry, of Lafayette, Ind., was the leader of song, and to the large number in our brotherhood who are acquainted with her no comment is necessary. She seems to possess all the qualities necessary in the ideal singing evangelist. There are few soloists who can bring the sweet gospel message in song with such effect as she. Her work as a leader is superb, and as a personal worker she is singularly winsome and effective.

Among the pastor-evangelists of our brotherhood, to my mind, T. Alfred Fleming has few peers. His work as an evangelist is of the very highest type. Seldom does one hear the gospel preached so fearlessly, and yet there are none who stick closer to Paul's injunction to "preach the truth in love." Brother Fleming presented the open book to the people, and the campaign was quite as much educational as evangelistic. Scores learned the will of God more perfectly.

Another feature of the meeting was the permanent character of the results. Brother Fleming never failed to emphasize the cost of service. Those who confessed Christ did so because of a deeply-rooted conviction, and not under any emotional pressure. However, most of the additions came not as a result of the preaching from the pulpit, but as a direct result of personal effort. Brother Fleming is a prodigious worker; and, more than that, he is able to inspire others to do personal work. As in the days of the early church, the Disciples "went everywhere preaching the word." Altogether one hundred and eleven were added to the church, making a total membership of 350. The Sunday-school now has an attendance equal to the membership, including one of the largest Bible classes of Ohio, taught by Mr. Huber, the mayor of our city. The spirit of enthusiasm and optimism pervades every activity of our church life. We now rank second among the religious bodies of our town and hope soon, by right of our plea, to be the leading people in this community.

It was a great campaign. "Paul planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase."

Charles C. Wilson, Minister.

I think it is due to the pastor of the Shelby church, Brother Wilson, to Miss Una Dell Berry, soloist and leader of song, and to the members of the Shelby church that I say a few words, viewing the field from my standpoint as the evangelist.

It was an accepted fact by all who knew the field, the town, the denominational churches there, and the entire surroundings, that Shelby was the hardest field in Ohio, and perhaps in many states. The political ring of the town was unquestionably antagonistic to all Christian influence, and was always ready to show the effects of Tammany on every honest and beneficient endeavor. The history of some recent pastorates in four or five of the churches aided in establishing a strong line of defense against any good move. We had a church disrupted a year ago now coming together, but unable to line up at the beginning and do hard work. All these conditions worked against the acceptance of the proposition of the young and energetic pastor who had just recently thrown his energies into the field. To add to this, on the very verge of the meeting a scarlet fever scourge broke out, and graded schools, high school and Sunday-schools were closed. These were desperate conditions for the opening of a campaign for souls. The pastor, large in faith, rich in sympathy and abundant in energy, had led his people up to the opening in wonderful preparation, carefully planning the minutest details. Nothing was left undone. The faithful were at his side throughout the whole campaign, ready to do their part. Una Dell Berry was on hand with a chorus of forty voices, assisted by organ, piano and orchestra. I can not say too much in praise of her work. She has certainly earned her place in the very front rank of singing evangelists. Her leading of the large chorus and audience was certainly an inspiration to call forth any man's best effort, while her solos were sweetened with that pathos which carried the gospel message straight home to the hearts of sinners. Her part as a personal worker could not be excelled by any. The meeting lasted four weeks, with a total of 111 additions, only seven of these being children. Eighty per cent were heads of families and a great number of these husbands.

T. Alfred Fleming, Evangelist.

As a slight token of their gratitude to their pastor for his untiring zeal, the members of the official board decided to raise the salary of Brother Wilson $200.

We feel that God has richly blessed us all in this meeting, and may his blessing be ever upon them, and may his Spirit guide to still greater victories.

T. Alfred Fleming, Evangelist.

The writer's connection with the church at Shelby covers about twenty-five years. During the greater number of these years the congregation had for a home a little old-fashioned building, unfavorably located. During this period our town made very little industrial progress, and increased but little in population, and, although regular preaching was maintained and evangelistic meetings were held annually, the church, like the town, in which it dwelt, just about held its own. About fifteen years ago the town began to take on new growth and importance because of the location in it of a large manufactory. This was followed by the location in it of other factories so that, by the year 1900, Shelby had completely changed from a quiet, indifferent village of about 1,800 souls into a busy, aggressive and enthusiastic manufacturing center, with a population of about 6,000. This gave the church a larger field of activity, and, catching the enthusiastic and progressive spirit of the town, it dreamed of and brought forth greater things. But, alas, it could do but little on account of the hampering and embarrassing influence of the menial building in which it was housed.

Early in the present century the church, though few in members and weak of purse, but rich in faith and Christian optimism, began an enterprise which culminated in the splendid modern church home which it now occupies. There seemed to be nothing in the way of progress. The church building was as good as any other in the town. The membership earnest, enthusiastic, united, hopeful and faithful, seeming to be in favor with God, and the people prayed, hoped and worked for great things. But, alas, one of those unfortunate occurrences, which no one but God can foreknow or forestall, now came to pass, and the church was almost in a moment plunged from prosperity and hope into adversity and despair. For a time disruption and utter ruin seemed inevitable, but wisdom prevailed and prevented such a deplorable end of all labors, sacrifices and hopes. Now, thank God, the church has recovered. But recovery was slow and had not progressed very far when the present pastor, C. C. Wilson, assumed the pastorate about eight months ago. Nor, indeed, was it complete when our evangelistic campaign began. This was the condition when the evangelist appeared upon the scene. The field, always a difficult one because of the strong entrenchments and antagonism of denominationalism, became doubly difficult after discord and disgruntlement arose in our ranks. These two factors, supplemented by a third, general indifference or ungodliness of the unsaved of our town, formed a trio of obstacles that seemed quite insurmountable. These obstacles, however, under the skillful strategy of Brother Wilson, the persistent activities of the personal workers, the solo and chorus work under Sister Berry, the splendid preaching of Brother Fleming and the fervent prayers of all, became a negligible quantity before the meeting was a week old. Discord gave place to harmony, indifference to a lively interest, prejudice to fairness.

All things considered, the meeting was a phenomenal one. It was phenomenal in respect of patronage, opening and closing with a full house. Many times it was impossible to seat all the people that came. It was phenomenal in the radius of its influence. Its influence not only reached into every part of our town, but, overlooking corporate boundaries, spread for miles over the adjacent territory. It was phenomenal in enlisting so many adults under the gospel banner. All but seven were adults, and many of these were husbands and wives who came out together. It was phenomenal in its absence of sensational features. From first to last the gospel was preached in its fullness and purity, but in such a loving and gentle spirit that no one was offended. Jesus of Nazareth was proclaimed as the only begotten Son of God, and the sinner's only hope and salvation. He was declared to be the King of kings and Lord of lords, who had gone forth conquering and to conquer until every knee should bow and every tongue confess that he is Lord, commanding all men everywhere to surrender upon the simple terms and conditions of his last proclamation to the world—the gospel. By this preaching the gospel proved itself to be "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believes," as it has been from the beginning, is now, and ever shall be unto the end of time.

Missouri Bible College.

Almost without exception the young men have been recalled by their respective churches for the coming year. Three years ago our men were looking for churches. Now churches are looking for our students. Our students have received into their congregations during the last eighteen months above 200 additions.

Men who are capable of caring for congregations are almost sure of supporting churches within a few weeks of their arrival in Columbia, and their connection with the Bible College.

The Philokurian Society, our preachers' literary society, has a committee whose duty and pleasure it is to correspond both with churches desiring help and with students desiring to enter college. Brother C. E. Burgess is chairman of the committee.

NEW ORLEANS IN 1908.

New Orleans is the "Crescent City," and is as unique as the luminary from which it takes its appellation, having attractions all its own.

Here is the most cosmopolitan city on the continent, a mixture of Europe and America, a medley of medievalism and modernity; having been founded in 1718, there broods over portions of the city the spirit of antiquity as is manifest in French and Spanish life, while other portions bristle with modern spirit and fill the soul with the impulse of American progress.

On one side of Canal street is the city of "Creoles" and foreigners, representing Europe with its love for the spectacular and antiquities; among which are the quaint old cathedral, where for more than a hundred years the devotees of the dominant religion have worshipped; the Cabildo, where the Napoleonic and Spanish commissions transferred to the United States government the Louisiana Purchase which Napoleon prophesied would make the United States the formidable power which should put to flight the "Red Coats;" the battlefield of Chalmette, where the indomitable Jackson fulfilled the prophecy of Napoleon in 1815; the old St. Louis Hotel, where stand the slave blocks from which thousands of blacks were sold at auction; the celebrated French Market, with its booths decorated with flowers and fruits from every clime; the City Hall, modeled after the Temple of Minerva of the Grecian Acropolis; the old trellised mansions, possessing all the charms associated with courts, foundations, flowers and ivy-covered walls; and as a stranger wanders through the streets and sequestered courts of ancient New Orleans, he breathes the atmosphere of another age and clime, and feels that here are the evidences of the first American aristocracy.

On the other side of Canal street is modern America; with all her vision, pluck, energy, thrift, enterprise, aesthetic taste and culture; commanding a thousand genii whose architectural skill and mechanical ingenuity lift the modern "sky-scrapers" and build palatial homes, and lay out parks and gardens; where the mocking bird sings from the spreading branches of the magnolia, the flowers blush in profusion, and the jasmine freights the atmosphere with the aromatics of nature's sweetest distillations, making one to feel that heaven and earth have conspired together to make this the nearest possible approach to the Elysium of the Fairy Land.

New Orleans has built steadily along conservative lines for two hundred years until she has spread out over an area of one hundred and ninety-six square miles; over thirteen million dollars are being spent this year in new buildings; two millions for improvement on the twelve miles of docks, and eighteen millions on the improvement of the waterworks and drainage; and she has just caught the vision of the possibilities within her reach, and feeling keenly the spurs of competition, she is knitting together her muscles and leaning forward as she makes unprecedented strides towards the highest ideal in material progress. New York is her only rival in America in clearing house receipts; she leads the markets of the world in four of the staple articles; her cotton scepters the wardrobe of the nations, her sugar sweetens the palate of "Uncle Sam," her rice graces his pantry, and her fruit is the magic charmer at all his feasts; her imports have increased 50 per cent in five years, and her exports amounted to more than $150,000,000 this year. New Orleans is a great heart of commerce and immigration.

Whether the spirit and blood of the commercial life of New Orleans which go out over the arteries of traffic throughout our land shall be foul and disease-breeding, or pure and health-giving; whether America's influence upon the nations, as it gathers here and is poured out through the mouth of the "Father of Waters," shall be a gigantic stream of poison and death, like hell's horrid breath; or like a river of living waters quenching all thirst, of which if the nations drink they shall live, depends upon those who stand for the restoration of the primitive gospel and the coronated God.

Now is the opportune time for us to come into prominence with our plea for "unity, liberty, and democracy" in Christ, and ride into prosperity on the very crest of the wave of enthusiasm for Greater New Orleans; but we are few, less than a hundred members, submerged in the midst of a population of four hundred thousand of inhabitants; forty thousand of which are German, thirty thousand French, twenty-five thousand Italian, seventy-seven thousand colored, five thousand Jews, and many Spanish, Russian, Norwegian, Slavs, Hungarian and Chinese; sixty thousand of these are Roman Catholics, five thousand Episcopalians, five thousand German Protestants, forty-four hundred Lutherans, four thousand Presbyterians, three thousand and five hundred Methodists, three thousand Baptists, and we are so small that we are not worth mentioning. Then, how shall we accomplish anything worth considering in such a great population? The Baptist Church South is giving $28,000 to missions in New Orleans this year; we are not asking for any such contribution from our Home Board this year, but your humble servant has brought our brotherhood to the attention of the governor of the state, the mayor and the Commercial Club of the city; and they, representing the pulse-beat of cordiality and the handshake of welcome of all the people, are cordially inviting all our brethren to come and enjoy their hospitality and feast for one week; we hope by this means we shall have the largest membership of any one Protestant body in this city for at least one week; so that they may leave the impress of their heaven-born image upon the denizens of the whole Southland, and carry back with them such impressions of opportunity and obligation as shall appeal to the heroism of every soldier of the cross.

Such a visit will help you; for, here, you can study the religious conditions in miniature of both Europe and America as well as the social problems and the race question at first hand; it will help the cause of missions for the reason that the vision of fields so white unto the harvest, which go to waste for the want of laborers, will fill you with a heaven-born impulse for missions so that you can not help giving and inducing others to give even beyond their ability and praying our missionary societies with much entreaty to receive the gifts that they may have fellowship in administering the life-giving and soul-cleansing draught unto the dying millions of our own land until "America" shall be the synonym for Christianity all over the world.

Let all join in singing this little ode in response to the invitation of New Orleans, and the Soniat Avenue Christian Church which raises its voice in a Macedonian call.

"The world has its eye on New Orleans:
Historic, romantic, unique;
The Crescent of earth and of ocean;
The city both new and antique.

"She offers us rich invitation,
With halls and hotels all replete,
To join in a great convocation
Of love and enjoyment complete.

"The land of magnolia and flowers
Invites us, in nineteen and eight,
To come and receive the great showers
Of blessings and cheers which await.

Chorus:

"Then I'll meet you in New Orleans,
Hie-away, hie-away.
In New Orleans, I'll [illegible] your hand
And greet you all in Dixie;
Away, away,
Away down south in Orleans;
Away, away,
Away down south in Orleans."

I wrote these lines to be sung to the tunes of "Columbia the Gem of the Ocean" and "Dixie Land," and it was sung in Norfolk when it was unanimously decided by the convention to accept our invitation, but we want you to come ten thousand strong with rejoicing and a determination to do all that is within your power to give the cause of Christ a lift and start on the way to success and glory.

NEWS FROM MANY FIELDS

Chicago Letter.

My letter to THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST must of necessity be short this time, as I have just recently been elected secretary of th Chicago Christian Missionary Society, which carries with it the secretaryship of the Second district. Hereafter I promise you a letter full of news about the work in our city and the Second district. The new board has been in authority only a month, during which time we have been meeting for several hours each week, in an endeavor to understand the demands of the field and to plan for the work of the coming year. Under the provisions of the revised constitution of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society, the board is now composed of six members and a president, who is ex officio member of the board, thus making a board of seven members. The board is comp sed as follows: President, Leon L. Loehr; vice-president, W. F. Rothenberger; secretary, Parker Stockdale, 1010 Jackson boulevard; treasurer, A. L. Roach, 315 Dearborn street; E. S. Ames, O. F. Jordan, G. F. Flick and F. F Miller. For convenience in carrying on the work, we have divided the territory into the North, West and South sides, and appointed committees to supervise the work in their respective districts. The North Side committee is composed of O. F. Jordan and F. F. Miller; West Side committee is composed of Parker Stockdale and A. L. Roach; South Side committee is composed of E. S. Ames and G. F. Flick. The North Side is composed of the following churches and missions: Evanston Church, Irving Park Church, Waukegan Church, Sheffield Avenue Mission, Logan Square Mission, Humboldt Park Mission. The West Side is composed of the following churches and missions: Jackson Boulevard Church, Metropolitan Church, Monroe Street Church, Austin Church, Douglas Park Mission, Maywood Mission, West End and Elgin Missions. The South Side is composed of the following churches and missions: Englewood Church, First Church, Hyde Park Church, Harvey Church, Ashland Avenue Church, South Chicago Mission, West Pullman Mission, Garfield Boulevard Mission, Chicago Heights Mission and Armour Avenue Mission (colored.) Logan Square and Humboldt Missions are without pastors on the North Side. On the West Side, Douglas Park and West End are without pastors. On the South Side, Garfield Boulevard is without a pastor. We are at present considering all these points which are without pastors, and hope to be able to report in my next communication the location of men to carry on the work these missions. When this is done I shall send you a complete list of all our churches and missions, with the names and addresses of all pastors. There prevails among us a spirit of hopefulness and a desire to make this the best year in the history of our city work. Few of the brethren, who have not worked and preached in this great city, realize the stupendous difficulties always before us here. All should be grateful for the work already accomplished. A man is called to a life of heroic sacrifice who is the faithful and earnest pastor of a Chicago church or mission. This coming year we all desire to strengthen the spirit of harmony and enthusiasm which characterizes the work at the present time. G. A. Campbell, who has worked here for many years, says that never before in the history of Chicago has our work been so successful and the spirit of sympathy and co-operation so prevalent.

We are all looking forward with eagerness to the next state convention, which is to be held in the Jackson Boulevard Church. Already we have commenced our plans and appointed committees with the view of having the greatest convention in our history in Illinois. Next spring Dr. H. L Willet and I expect to attend all the district conventions and speak in behalf of our city work and the state convention. This week C. G. Kindred, of the Englewood church, goes to a meeting of the State Board, of which he is a member, with the express aim of taking the initial steps in seeking to bring about at the next convention the greatest men's meeting ever held in the state. We promise the brethren of Illinois that no stone will be left unturned to prepare for a great and glorious convention next autumn. It is our desire to maintain the heartiest sentiment of fellowship and co-operation with our brethren throughout the state. Hereafter address your communication to the secretary, who will give immediate attention to all.

Parker Stockdale,
Secretary Chicago Christian Missionary Society.

November Sheaves from Kentucky Mission Fields.

Z. Ball has moved into Jackson county and is the living-link worker of Broadway Church, Lexington. His first move was to help raise funds to complete the old union house of worship.——Berea and outlying districts had the services of C. A. Vanwinkle. Elbert Winkler did most of the preaching at Pleasant Grove; 12 added.——Robert H. Carter has completed the year's work at Belleview, Boone county, and hopes to have the church take care of itself for 1980.——There were 22 added in Harlan county as the result of the efforts of J. W. Masters during twenty-five days of the month. A new congregation organized. This makes four in the county of Harlan, where a few years ago we had nothing.——Nothing special in the work at Valley View and Irvine, as reported by O. J. Young. He says the work does well.——The meeting at Jackson, in which C. M. Summers and the church were helped by W. J. Cocke, resulted in eight added and other good.——Cocke held a meeting at Williamstown and is at the first of this month at Paintsville, for a second meeting this year. He raised money at Williamstown to employ a preacher for half time during 1908. Added during the month, 14.——D. G. Combs was at Hazel Green three Sundays and preaching at Ezel and Tom's Branch much of the time—39 added. It is the neediest field he ever saw.——E. B. Richey was at South Louisvile two Sundays and the others were supplied by other preachers. Three baptisms and 14 officers appointed. Mission now numbers about 160—a growth from about 20 in the past two years, or a little longer.——Latonia and H. C. Runyon are progressing as usual. Four added. One of the number is Earl B. Barr, who a few months ago left our ranks and entered those of the Episcopalians. He is capable of being useful and while he was reared in the communion from which he has just returned, found that he could not be satisfied there.——L. B. Haskins and the work at Erlanger are soon to part company—much to the regret of the Erlanger people. It is hoped that arrangements will be made at an early date for a man to succeed him.——Two added at Bardstown and the work in very good condition. J. B. Briney will preach half time there during 1908.——Twenty-two additions in the Cumberland county field where Robert Kirby is at work.——H. H. Thompson has been doing some excellent work in rallying the churches to give something in support of Kentucky missions. Ten additions.——In Rockcastle and Powell counties 17 added, as indicated by C. W. Campbell and other good wrought.——Chatham had the usual sermons by J. W. Ligon and work doing very well.——J. P. Bornwasser says that the attendance at Bromley is better than at any time during the year. Concrete sidewalks are being laid. Seven added as the result of seventeen sermons preached by S. J. Short in the Big Sandy Valley.——The month was spent by H. W. Elliott at work at home and abroad. He preached at eight churches. The receipts amounted to $1,095.20—an increase over November, 1906, of $642.63. However, $300 of this amount was given by one brother and the increase in regular receipts from the churches amounted to $342.63. This has come from congregations asked for less than $40 each. We have yet to hear from the larger congregations that are raising larger amounts—as well as many of those giving smaller sums. We urge the friends to remit at an early date. We need to be able to pay our workers in full to January 1 and to plan for our 1908 campaign.

GREAT MEETING AT CENTERVILLE, IOWA

William J. Lockhart closed a meeting of unusual proportions at Centerville, Ia., Sunday evening, Dec. 8. He was ably assisted by P. M. Kendall as chorus director, and F. A. Wilkinson as soloist and personal worker. The meeting began with a large audience and attracted unusual and favorable attention from the beginning. The largest audiences in the history of this part of the state assembled. The large building was often far too small to accommodate the people, hundreds frequently being turned away. There were but two regular invitations, on two successive Sunday mornings, without accessions. There were 29 accessions at the first invitation, 16 at the second and 52 at the last, this being the largest number of accessions at a single invitation. It was planned to close the meeting on Wednesday evening previous, but the impetus was such that this was impossible. The meeting began November 3 and closed December 8 with a lecture and travel scenes by Brothers Lockhart and Kendall. The total number of people taking a stand for Christ was 404. A notable feature of the meeting was its increasing and sustained interest. The interest never flagged. The spiritual feeling was intense throughout. To explain the cause of such pronounced results would be, as it always is, impossible. The time was opportune, the weather favorable and great zeal and earnestness was manifest. But back of all were the personalities and the messages of the meeting. Lockhart, Kendall and Wilkinson are all unusual men, good men, gifted men. Brother Lockhart is pointed, clear, emphatic and desperately in earnest. His invitations are masterly, possessing all the qualifications of the invitation in symmetrical and beautifully balanced proportions. The meetings' aim was threefold—to convert the unconverted, edify Christians and to build up the Bible school. Our school was doubled in attendance and greatly strengthened in power. Brother Kendall remains with us a few weeks to assist in enlisting the new members and organizing the Sunday-school and other forces.

John Sherman Hill, pastor.

Canada Letter.

The conventions in the Western and Niagara districts of Ontario were profitable meetings. The convention of the Western district was held at Poplar Hill. J. M. Vanhorn, of Toronto, was present for an address. The Niagara district held its convention at Winger. The reports from the churches showed growth in most of the fields. The principal addresses were given by E. B. Black, of London, Ont.—one on "Church Finance," which was full of good things on a troublesome subject, and an evening address on "Sunday-school Work," which was greatly enjoyed by all.——Church building and remodeling seems to be active just now. Ridgetown, Ont., has recently remodeled its house, which now presents a very attractive appearance. Welland, Ont., has sold its old property and bought in a better location. A new and modern house will be built. A church extension society has promised aid. At Summerville, N. S., the house has been remodeled and enlarged. It was rededicated on September 22. The church building at Milton, N. S., is in process of reconstruction, providing for baptistry, robing rooms and other modern conveniences, while at Back Bay, N. B., the house has been greatly improved throughout, and has just been reopened.—The Maritime C. W. B. M., under the presidency of Mrs. A. Murray, of Leonardville, N. B., had a prosperous year last year. Miss Inez Logan, who has recently gone as a missionary to the Philippines, has been assigned to this organization as its living link by the F. C. M. S.——J. F. Floyd, pastor at Coburg Street, St. John, N. B., is in a meeting with his own church, assisted by home forces.——The work in Halifax, N. S., under R. Everett Stevenson, is showing increased activity. Two persons have recently been received by baptism there. There were two baptisms and a number restored in a short meeting by H. Murray at South Range, N. S. Five persons confessed Christ in a meeting held by J. H. McQuerry at Kempt, N. S., recently. A. J. McLeod is assisting E. C. Ford in a special meeting in Picton, N. S. Picton is a difficult field, but the work has made gratifying progress in the two years of Brother Ford's pastorate.——The work in St. Thomas, Ont., under M. M. Ammunson, is going forward splendidly. The church is finely equipped now with an up-to-date building. Full houses greet the preaching of the Word, and all departments of the work are being thoroughly organized and vigorously carried forward.——C. S. Scriven is held in high esteem at West Lorne and Rodnew, Ont., where the work is being strengthened by his faithful ministry. He has recently brought a most efficient helpmate from old Eureka to share his ministry and the appreciation in which he is held. They have a promising field.——Ridgetown, Ont., is at present without a preacher. They have an excellent church building, well located, and a substantial membership. There is a good town and a fine surrounding territory in which to build up New Testament Christianity. They are searching for a man to lead them in the work.——Sinclair College, at St. Thomas, is pushing its claims before the brotherhood of Ontario. Twenty students are in attendance this year. Twelve of these have decided upon the ministry as a life work. Principal Lumley and his assistants are working hard to prepare these young men for usefulness. The work is deserving of the hearty sympathy and support of the Ontario brotherhood as the only effort being made on Canadian soil to solve the problem of a ministry for the Canadian work. The time is near when an enlargement of the work will be an imperative necessity if we are to maintain any effort worthy of us, as a people, to educate a native ministry. R. W. Stevenson, the provincial evangelist, is assisting Pastor Merry in a meeting at West Lake, Ont.——Sunday, December 1, was "Education day" for Ontario churches. Let an offering be made in all the churches this month for the work of education and sent to F. E. Lumley, St. Thomas, Ont.

A Revival That Revived.

In some respects one of the most remarkable meetings held in this section has just been concluded at Liberty, Ill. Evangelist A. R. Spicer, of Moweauqua, Ill., was in charge, and his forceful messages won the minds and his Christian spirit the confidence of people, irrespective of their religious or irreligious inclinations. In addition to the hundreds who crowded the building from night to night, the telephone was employed along sixty-three lines. There were fifty-three additions—thirty-two by baptism, twenty-one by letter, statement, or reclaimed, eight being from other religious bodies. Most of the converts were men and the majority adults.

L. D. McLean, a student of Christian University, is the aggressive minister, whose thorough preparation contributed much to the success of the work. He is to remain with the church at an increase of salary. This congregation burned the last note against it on the second Sunday of the meeting, and is united and happy. Singing Evangelist H. C. Hoggat, of Decatur, was with us the first Sunday, to our delight. A large number of church papers will go into the homes of the people as a result of the meeting.—Floyd Mercer, clerk.

Fulton's Good Meeting.

The Fulton church closed a very successful three-weeks' revival. W. H. Book, pastor of the Tabernacle Church of Christ, Columbus, Ind., was the evangelist, and Frank C. Huston, of Indianapolis, Ind., was chorus director and soloist. The visible results of the campaign are 88 additions—64 by primary obedience, 20 by letter or statement, and four from other churches. There were nine conversions on the last night of the meeting. Brother Book was in Fulton a year ago and added at that time about 50 to the church. Fulton is the only Missouri church which has ever fortunately secured his services. He is one of the strongest pastors and evangelists. Our meeting served as a great blessing to the church in furthering and perfecting the work of unity in this congregation. We are a united, peaceful, prosperous and happy church. Brother Huston delighted the audience with his direction of the chorus and effective solos.

AND OTHER POEMS

The above-named book, by W. T. Moore, is the most beautiful volume that has ever borne the imprint of the Christian Publishing Company. A surprisingly large quantity of pure gold was consumed in decorating the cover. The poems are printed on heavy linen paper—the pages look like parchment.

In the contents of the book are found the humor and pathos, the learning and philosophy that have made this venerable, yet ever young scholar, the most picturesque figure among our churches to-day.

This will make a most admirable Christmas gift. Sent postpaid and with presentation card enclosed for $2.00.

SOME OF OUR CHURCHES RECENTLY DEDICATED.

Frederick, Ok.

The church here has just enjoyed a great day. L. L. Carpenter dedicated the new building, raising $1,500 more than enough to pay all encumbrances. We are rejoicing over the victory and follow with a revival meeting, led by J. F. Bickle, of Eldon, Mo.—Charles P. Murphy, minister.

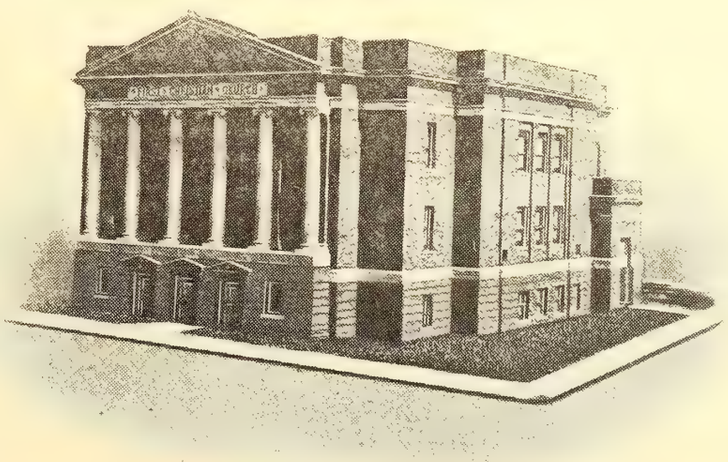
North Eaton, O.

We think we have the most up-to-date country church in the state. Repairs costing $2,200 have just been made. Over $1,200 having been paid, we had but $1,000 to raise on dedication day. H. Newton Miller, our state secretary, was our helper and after his address on "The Exaltation of Christ," the appeal was responded to by cash and pledges to the amount of $1,116. The ladies' choir of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Elyria assisted us. In the afternoon Lathrop Cooley, H. N. Allen, S. L. Lyon, Brother Doyle, the Baptist minister at Columbia, took part, Brother Miller making the dedicatory speech and preaching at night. Brother Cooley and wife donated us a fine bell and received a rising vote of thanks for the beautiful gift.

John A. Armstrong, pastor.

Beatrice, Neb.

Happy are the people at Beatrice. The greatest achievement in church history there is the completion and dedication, free of debt, of the First Christian Church. F. M. Rains was present, and after a call for twenty thousand dollars by the end of the day thirty thousand had been pledged. The total cost of the building and equipment was about forty thousand dollars—ten thousand more than the church expected when they first entered on the work. Eighteen years ago Brother Rains dedicated the old church on the same site.



Pastors of other churches in the city were present to express their appreciation and congratulations. One of them remarked that as three-fourths of the population of Beatrice did not attend church services of any kind, if every seat in every church of the city were filled there would not be half room enough. The state secretary, W. A. Baldwin, in a short address, said that all over the state there would be great joy at what this church had accomplished. The new building, a picture of which we present on this page, seats 1,207 people besides the chorus, and has all modern facilities. It is of the Grecian type of architecture, constructed of brownish-gray iron-spot brick, trimmed in granite. The plan of the building covers three stories, besides the sub-basement which is used as a boiler and storage room. In the rear of the main auditorium are eight large rooms. Entrance to the auditorium is made through a double vestibule, the steps all on the inside.

Great credit for its erection is due to J. E. Davis, the minister, though he himself would put the chief praise upon the building committee whose untiring efforts and fearlessness have brought to realization the dream of this church for the past dozen years. Brother Davis, we must say, however, is a man who thinks and a man who acts.

J. E. Davis, Pastor.

With this new plant we have every assurance that our cause will go on conquering and to conquer at Beatrice. The First Christian Church in Beatrice was organized in 1872, with 22 charter members. It has grown to be a congregation numbering more than 600. Among those who have ministered to it may be mentioned J. Mad Williams, Joseph Lowe, William G. Springer, Eli Fisher, R. H. Ingram, J. D. Dabney, A. C. McKeever, F. A. Bright, D. W. Wickizer, Edgar Price and the present pastor, J. E. Davis, who began his work here January 1, 1906. The church supports a medical missionary in India and is in line with all home organized work. It is preparing for a great meeting with Charles Reign Scoville.

First Christian Church, Beatrice, Neb.

Mitchell, Neb.

The church at Mitchell, Neb., is less than two years old. It is a child of the Nebraska Christian Missionary Society, and has had as many ills as such children usually have. Its growth has not been out of the ordinary and its successes are not phenomenal except in the matter of the new church building recently completed and dedicated. The state secretary was honored with an invitation to lead the forces on this occasion. The total cost, including lots and furniture, was $3,850 in round numbers. It is seated in the main part with good pews and heated with a furnace. Chairs are used in the lecture room. It is a finely-built and well-proportioned structure of cement brick veneer, located on a prominent corner in the town. The building exceeded the first intentions of the brethren, but is a credit to the town. They needed about $1,600 to cover the total cost and this was promised.

R. M. Dungan preaches here half time. He is greatly esteemed by the church. The preachers of the Methodist Episcopal and Presbyterian churches were present at the sessions, having dismissed their meetings. Mitchell is growing rapidly and promises to be a town of business importance in that great irrigation valley. It is the purpose to hold a meeting and organize a congregation at Morrill, the next town west and where we have perhaps 20 members in the village and vicinity. This, too, is a rapidly growing town.

W. A. Baldwin.

The Cabinet Organ in a New Light.

"We are sitting in the adjoining room; it is still and shadowy, and we are listening to music which seems to come from invisible spheres. A solo-violin-run ascends, a second and a third voice joins in; chords are formed which caressingly melt into each other; all at once they begin to vibrate and soon a voice is heard like a hundred harps and viols, becoming louder and heavier until it spreads clear and ethereal in a double chorus. Trombones call out, horns respond; the full volume breaks in and the hot streams of the harmonies are beginning to flow. A mystic transfigured mood remains, and slowly a touching melody grows up over it, now dying down to the sweet, fluting voice, now sounding plaintively in the effecting tones of the Oboe. The Violins and the Clarionets are heaving and waving and their lines cut into each other. A more passionate idyl evolves and the deep bass sings its hymn between, which is repeated by the full volume but in delightful piano. The mood overpowers us, and as we listen, we believe we are looking into a landscape of sounds, shining in uncommonly intense colors."

The above quotation is from an essay by the distinguished critic, musician and litterateur, Dr. Oscar Bie of Berlin. The instrument referred to is the Mason & Hamlin Cabinet Organ; the Music, Paul Koeppen's Normal-Harmonium Literature.

The Cabinet Organ was invented, and, in all its essential features, perfected by Mason & Hamlin of Boston. About 1850 Mr. Emmons Hamlin, a brilliant mechanic and one of the founders of the Mason & Hamlin business, discovered the art of voicing reeds, by which they could be made to imitate the Clarionet, the Oboe, the Violin, and other instruments, making possible a great variety of tone color, in place of the thin, monotonous tone which had hitherto characterized the melodeon.

A realization of the full possibilities of this invention required radical changes in the construction of the instrument, and in 1855, Mason & Hamlin brought out the Organ Harmonium, which was a great advance over anything known before. In 1861, they introduced the Cabinet Organ in its present form, and since that time, have been producing instruments which have never been equaled in quality of tone and the charming effects of which they are capable.

Here, as in every field of endeavor, preeminent merit has been widely recognized and appreciated. Although the Mason & Hamlin organs are the highest priced of any organs made, they are imported into every country on the globe, a large proportion of the finer organs going to Germany and other European countries in the face of high duties and home competition.

The Koeppen literature referred to is edited by Mr. Paul Koeppen of Berlin (formerly known as Special literature for Mason & Hamlin Harmonium) and published by Breitkopf & Hartel of Liepsic, London and New York. For the ordinary player, this Literature is as important as the right kind of an organ, as by its use, the organ is made available in its true character of an orchestral instrument. The literature now comprises over five hundred original compositions and arrangements by the best authors, adapted to the peculiar characteristics of the instrument. The stops to be used are indicated, and with it any one who can play the notes can render the works of the great masters with impressive effect. It brings the charming music of the reed organ within the range of players of even moderate ability, and its introduction may fairly be said to mean the creation of a new school of art.

Midweek Prayer-Meeting

By Charles Blanchard.

Spreading the Christmas Joy.

Topic December 25.—Luke 2:17.

"And when they had seen, they made known abroad the saying which was told them concerning this child."

It is the sweet old story of the Babe of Bethlehem, "born in a manger to sorrow and shame"; yet whose name is pre-eminent among all the names of earth's mighty ones. His name should be called Jesus, for he was to save his people from their sins. And because he is the Saviour of sinners, his name is above every name. He took not on him the nature of angels, but of the seed of Abraham, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, that he might through the suffering of death taste death for every man. Why, why, I wonder, will men try to get away from the atonement? Surely such an high priest became us, though we be not worthy of the least of all his mercies.

The birth of the human Christ is significant only as we come to see in him the divine Son of God and the world's Saviour. It is all a poetical fancy, a fanatical delusion, a dream of mortals doomed to disappointment and despair, else Jesus be what he claimed to be, the Son of God and our Saviour, declared to be such by the resurrection from the dead. This is the supreme fact for the Christmas season. It is a beautiful thing to celebrate the birth of the Christ-Child, but an awful thing to rob ourselves of the blessings that can come to us only through his life and death and resurrection. It is the simplest sort of logic and I can not understand how so many who keep holiday (holy day), and who catch a bit of the Christmas spirit, can turn away from the claims of the Christ who brought us all the joys and hopes of the brightest day of all the year.

If we would make known the Christmas joy we must ourselves come to know that joy, through the knowledge of the Saviour. It is not enough that we catch the strain of the angels' song, or listen to the story of the birth of the Babe in Bethlehem. We must be at pains to go where the Christ can be found. "And it came to pass as the angels were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem and see this thing which has come to pass, which the Lord has made known unto us." In this is the very spirit of all true, interested inquiry. We who would spread the Christmas joy and the glad tidings of his truth and salvation must first go and see and learn what the Lord has made known unto us. O, this is the need of the Church and of the world to-day—to know what the Lord has already made known unto us—unto such as will read the record and receive it, as it is indeed the word of God and not the word of men. "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God hath made him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life and he that hath not the Son hath not life." And the apostle adds: "These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God."

It is among the last messages of love to men. It is the message we need, who have believed on the Christ, that we may be filled with his joy and have our joy made full in ourselves. And being thus fully persuaded and possessed of the Christ and the Christmas spirit, we are fitted to go forth and to tell of the joys of his salvation, his presence and his abiding peace to others. And this is my message to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

AN UNUSUAL HONOR CONFERRED ON AN AMERICAN MANUFACTURER BY THE LATE KING OSCAR II OF SWEDEN.

The late King Oscar of Sweden was distinguished in the field of letters and music as well as that of statecraft, and his discriminating taste in things musical gave exceptional weight to his judgment in such matters.

Having secured one of the celebrated Cabinet Organs made by Mason & Hamlin of Boston, he was so pleased with the instrument that he conferred on its makers the extraordinary honor of an award of the much coveted Grand Swedish Gold Medal, Litteris et Artibus, an honor rarely conferred out of His Majesty's dominions.

He also presented one of the organs to the Royal Academy of Music at Stockholm, and appointed its makers Furnishers to his Court.

In the time of Jesus the cross was a symbol of the deepest shame that could overwhelm a human life. The deepest, bitterest degradation that could be experienced was associated with the cross. It was pain also as well as shame. Jesus endured the pain, despising the shame, for the joy that was set before him.

And wherein is the joy? In this, that each succeeding year has shown the power of God which raised Jesus and exalted him, working mighty salvation in all the earth through the cross. The church of Jesus Christ our Lord has made the cross its banner of conquest. The judgment of Calvary is being reversed.

Christian Endeavorers have only to look over the reports of our foreign missionary work to be assured of the ultimate triumph of the cross. What we, as people, are doing is multiplied by many other missionary agencies.

In Africa we began work in 1897. There are now 322 native Christians, a net gain for the year of 200; 1,500 Bible school pupils, and 800 Christian Endeavorers.

In China the work began in 1886. There are 842 native Christians, 560 Bible school pupils and 90 Christian Endeavorers.

The work in Cuba began in 1899. There are now 129 members. 122 in Bible schools and 37 Endeavorers.

The work in India began in 1882. There are now 930 native Christians, 2,064 Bible school pupils and 279 Endeavorers.

The work in Japan began in 1883. There are now 1,200 Christians and 1,896 in our Bible schools, with 36 Endeavorers.

The work in the Philippine Islands began in 1903. It had a remarkable growth last year, 943 being added, giving a present membership of 1,505.

The statistics of church and Bible school membership give little idea of the scope and power of the work. Thousands of pupils are in Christian day schools, under the care of Christian teachers, growing into Christian men and women.

Thousands of unfortunate people are treated in our hospitals and come to know the story of the gospel. The medical missionary not only preaches but heals. Many hear his preaching because they have been healed.

Similar blessed news comes from the report of the foreign work of the C. W. B. M.

The church of the living God is making a united and determined assault upon the strongholds of Satan in the lands of darkness.

One of the calls for 1908 is for fifty new missionaries for the Foreign Society alone. The C. W. B. M. will also call for many more. How many Christian Endeavorers as they read these lines will say, "Here am I, Lord; send me"? Pray that laborers be sent into this great field.

Review.—Read Psalm 98.

Golden Text for Quarter.—Thou crownest the year with thy goodness.—Psa. 65:11.

We are at the close of a year's lessons which have dealt with the Hebrew record of the beginning of the world and of the human race, and with the story of the rise of the Hebrew people from a single nomad family to a mighty nation about to receive the final seal of their nationality by organization into a kingdom.

From whatever point of view it is considered, this body of literature is one of the most remarkable and valuable literary products of any people. To begin with, it contains the only story of creation which, although emanating from a pre-scientific age, has kept the respect of thinking men in modern times. It has no valid claim to authority as a scientific statement, but it is drawn on broad lines and throws the emphasis upon the eternal principles involved in the formation of the universe. From its splendid opening note, "In the beginning, God," to the story of the flood and the symbolism of the rainbow, it presents the universe not as a chance aggregation of meaningless matter, but as the embodiment of the thought and wisdom and love of God. It gives not so much the history of creation as the philosophy of the history of creation, which is vastly more important.

The second group of lessons, from Abraham to Joseph, covered the period in which a single family was being trained to be the nucleus of a chosen nation. During this period the development was not in material prosperity, nor to any considerable extent in numbers. It was in knowledge of the will of God. Is it not a remarkable thing that the later age, in recounting the history of this long period, should be willing to preserve a narrative which included so small an element of material prosperity and aggrandizement and was concerned almost entirely with spiritual growth?

The national period, using the term somewhat loosely, began with the bondage. From the time of Moses to the days of Samuel, Israel was numerically a nation, but except on special occasions and in times of special danger, the tribes were isunited and often hostile, or at least indifferent, to each other. After the conquest there was a loss of that degree of union which had prevailed. The judges succeeded in uniting certain tribes into temporary and shifting groups, but never united Israel. That was the task of the kings.

The leaders of Israel always had a keen sense of the presence of God as the controlling factor in their national affairs. The development of that sense and the diffusion of it among the people was a large part of the purpose of that long training to which Israel was subjected. It was for this reason that the providence of God expressed itself in numerous acts of special care and protection, that the people might see in the clearest possible way the intimacy of that relation which God sustained to them.

The miracles of the early part of the Old Testament may seem to us very crude and improbable. It is easy for us to belittle the intelligence of the people who could believe that the Creator of heaven and earth would stoop to concern himself with the private affairs of shepherd nomads and semi-barbarous warriors. But without the conviction which was embodied in the record of those miracles, there would have been no basis for the development of a purer or better faith.

The care that God gave to his chosen people of old he bestows also upon his people to-day. Not by miracle or special interposition, but by the orderly working of the wise laws of his good universe does he show his love and care. There is no manna, no standing still of the sun on a day of victory, no opening of dry pathways through seas and rivers. But by the quiet and prosaic ways which we call "natural" his people are fed and housed and protected.

Here at the end of a year, after surveying the course of Israel's early history and noting its providential direction, we can recount our own blessings and say that we are much more blessed than they. This is a second thanksgiving day. "Thou crownest the year with thy goodness."

ANOTHER COMBINED SERVICE.—Sunday, December 1, the writer of these notes spent with the old, strong, spiritual church at Palmyra, in a day's rally. With the assistance of the superintendent of the Bible school, B. F. Glahn, the minister, Clarence E. Wagner, and the officers of the congregation, the Bible school and church service were conducted as one continuous service. All were so highly pleased with this method that it will likely be continued permanently. In the afternoon a fine crowd of children and citizens generally came together and I preached a sermon to the children. At night, after a sermon to a full house, a young married man came forward and confessed Christ, and thus closed a busy and happy day. Brother Wagner has been in the Palmyra pastorate only a short time, but he has already won the hearts of his people and the respect of the town. My visit to Palmyra was a delightful one in many ways, not the least of which was the opportunity to see a number of old friends, gained when I was pastor at Hannibal and president of Christian University near by. It was sweet to greet them and find them faithful in the Lord. May his blessing attend them even to the end!

A PREPARATORY INSTITUTE AND RALLY.—For several months I have had an engagement at Neosho, and so on December 8 I reported there for business. I was told that I was to help them prepare for entering their splendid new church, now nearing completion; and as they wish also to reshape the primary work, they called for our state primary superintendent, Mrs. Buxton, who spent Sunday and Monday with them, while I remained till Wednesday night. The school is growing rapidly. On the above named Sunday they broke the record with an attendance of 191. They will go into the new church building over 200 strong, and then, unless all signs fail, they will grow to be one of our largest, as they are now one of our best, schools. Brother Brockman, their superintendent for so long, is still in the lead and looking forward to the new facilities for the realization of many an ideal which could not be realized in the narrow limits of the old house. The worship was a combined service and it is thought it has come to stay. The primary will be reorganized, several organized adult classes will be formed and a teacher-training class of from 25 to 50 members will be started.

Those churches which expect to be in the lead in the way of houses of worship must take Neosho into account. One can count the church houses on very few fingers in this state which excel the one Neosho is now bringing to completion. It will cost $25,000, and will be complete, roomy, commodious and artistic in all its features and facilities. J. W. Baker, who has been the pastor for a year, is the leader in this splendid building enterprise. He raised the money, planned the structure, and is the superintending architect. He is enthusiastic in the work and deserves the confidence reposed in him by his people. He has everything organized for a month's revival in the new church, and there is very little in signs if the congregation is not double its present membership when the meeting closes. We did what we could to prepare them to enter this great church building with new purposes, new plans and new power. May the gracious favor of Jesus our Leader attend them. Neosho is growing rapidly, and this growth must be kept in sight by the church; hence this forward movement.

Another state Bible school superindent, C. L. Organ, writes me that he has been chosen to lead our Bible school forces in the state of Iowa and seeks counsel and pointers for the work. He is a worthy man to succeed our own Joe Bryan. He has the support of the Iowa State Board of Missions, under whose directions he works. My hand goes over the border to the new Iowa superintendent. Other states will appoint leaders soon, and after awhile we will have, it is hoped, a national Bible school superintendent.

What is Meant?

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

I have a deep interest in any question bearing upon the preachers and their problems. You raise the question as to the place the university-trained preacher is to have among the Disciples of Christ. So much is being said about the "View of the Bible, such as modern scholarship and research necessitates in most minds." and "The assured results of modern scholarship, both in science and religion," that I am constrained to ask what view of the Bible and theology is thus necessitated, and what are some of the assured results of modern science relating to religion? What is meant by the modern view of the world which is different from that held before the advent of modern science in respect of religion?

I will answer one of your queries as far as the churches of Nebraska are concerned: The young men who hold unequivocally to the great fundamental principles of Christian faith as revealed in the New Testament, including the divinity and lordship of Jesus as the only Saviour of men, and who hold to the inspiration and authority of the Holy Scriptures as the supreme guide in all matters of religious faith and duty; such men will find a hearty welcome in our churches to the full limit of our capacity for caring for them, and we will also agree to organize more churches to call others of like kind. We will insist upon only two other characteristics, which will be agreed by all they should have, Christian character and capability to preach. Send us some like that now. In the meantime please answer definitely the questions I have submitted in good faith. Sincerely, Beatrice, Neb. W. A. Baldwin.

[If Brother Baldwin has read such books as Dr. Fairbairn's "Place of Christ in Modern Theology," or Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall's "Universal Elements of the Christian Religion," or Dr. Gordon's "Christ of To-Day," and "The New Epoch For Faith," or any of a score of such modern books by modern evangelical scholars, he knows what we mean by the modern view of the Bible and of the world, in its relation to religion and faith. But if he has not read such books it would be useless to attempt to answer his questions in the space at our command. We urge upon our ministers, as far as possible, to keep in touch with the best thought of the age from men of faith and understanding. It not only freshens thought, but quickens faith and enables one to understand his brethren who write and preach in the light of present-day knowledge. Brother Baldwin probably does this, and asks his question for the benefit of those who do not. But no brief answer can take the place of some properly chosen reading on this question.—EDITOR.]

—Difficulties in the Bible. By R. A. Torrey. $.50. This book is the popular evangelist's answer to many alleged errors and contradictions found in the Bible. He has taken up those objections of which the modern infidel makes the most, and which are most puzzling to many Christians. It is exceptionally valuable to Christians other than preachers who have never had the opportunity in Bible colleges of learning the best replies to the scoffer. Among these difficulties are: God Hardening Pharaoh's Heart, The Imprecatory Psalms, The Antiquity of Man, etc.

The Festival of Hope.

"Christmas Day is, above all other days, the festival of hope," wrote Dean Farrar. "On that blessed day the thoughts of millions all over the habitable globe, from the huts of the Esquimaux to the kraals of the Kaffirs, and from the torrid zone down to the wigwams of the Patagonians and the stormy Antarctic isles, will turn to Bethlehem and to the Christ-child. All will be glad to think how to us is born in the city of David a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord. And why? Because even the dimmest and vaguest conception of Christmas will show that this commemorates an infinitude of love and infinitude of hope. It tells that man is not a worthless atom; that he is dear to God; that there is an infinite value and preciousness in this out mortal life.'

How Germany Makes the World's Toys.

The doll-manufacturing industry did not begin to assume conspicuous proportions until 1850. Before that time only wood and leather were used in this trade. At the time of the first London World's Fair a Sonneberg doll manufacturer brought home and improved a Chinese doll, made of heavy colored paper, and with movable head and limbs. Next came hairless wax heads. To begin with, the wax and varnish were put on the prepared head with a brush in a more or less crude or uneven manner, whereby the face was left expressionless. A thimble, so that story goes, one day fell into a dish of fluid wax. When its owner drew it forth it was found to be beautifully covered with a uniform coating of wax. The manufacturer caught the idea and established a factory for wax papier-mache dolls prepared by the dipping process. By giving the papier-mache a flesh tint and through the use of wheat powder, he attained a very good imitation of the human skin. Painting completed the process of facial expression. Next came the setting of artificial eyes, which are principally made in the little town of Laucha. These eyes soon were made movable, and the result was a sleeping doll. But the hairless head had to be improved. Human hair was originally used, but the discovery of mohair wigs opened up large possibilities in this line, as the fine, glossy hair of the Angora goat was found to be unsurpassable for this purpose. When mohair grew more expensive wool was added. In rapid succession there followed further inventions and discoveries until the modern, life-like, jointed, speaking doll was the result.—From "The German Toy Industry," by Edward T. Heyn, in the American Review of Reviews for December.

A Warm Hand Clasp.

"Tain't everybody has the gift of speakin' in a meetin', but everybody might have the gift of hand-shakin'," commented in homely fashion an observer of the rush and hurry with which people meet and pass nowadays, with no time or thought for word or hand clasp.

The Truth of It.

'Twas the night before Christmas, and all through the house
Not a creature was stirring, not even a mouse;
They all had been shopping and spent their last red,
And nervous prostration had sent them to bed.

He who feeds on Christ becomes Christ-like, as the silkworm takes the hue of the leaves on which it browses.—Alexander Maclaren.

The Jew and the Christmas Spirit.

So many Jews now observe Christmas day to the extent of exchanging gifts that the remarks of Rabbi Emil G. Hirsch, of Chicago, on what the Jew celebrates at the Christmas season have a peculiar interest. He points out the fact that Hanukah, the Jewish feast of lights, occurring on the twenty-fifth day of the midwinter month of the Jewish calendar, has a character of rejoicing that makes it akin to the Christian holiday. It commemorates the victory of the Maccabees over the Syrians and the re-dedication of the Temple, but its observance has come to take the form, in the main, of a children's festival, as Christmas does, and Dr. Hirsch says that the custom of decorating Christmas trees with candles

CHRISTMAS.

'Tis Christmas once again! that day of days,
When He the Son of God to us was given.
Awake and sing thy great Redeemer's praise,
And lift thine heart with gratitude to heaven.

When chaos reigned in heart of man, He came,
Freighted with light, the darkness to dispel
From those who welcomed Him; alas! the shame
That one should Him reject, who loved so well!

He loved so well; He suffered for our sake,
To teach us love to God and all mankind.
Oh! Light Divine, triumphantly to break
Sin's fetters, and give sight to sinful blind.

Dear Christmas Day, thou birthday of our Lord,
We welcome thee with joyous songs, and when
The Christmas message comes, with one accord, was borrowed from the Jewish usage in the celebration of Hanukah.
May each receive it with a glad Amen!

—Edith M. Bostaph.

While asserting that "the Christmas sentiment of 'good-will to men' is certainly an echo of the convictions and aspirations which the Jewish festival of lights emphasizes," and believing that sooner or later the two festivals will be celebrated on the same day, Dr. Hirsch calls attention to the shameful fact that even now, in some parts of Europe—particularly in Russia—Christmas is a day on which fanatical mobs are prone to attack their Jewish neighbors. "The Jew can not rejoice," he says, "nor sing of good-will, when he knows that the day of his joy has been and is the day of his helpless brothers' trembling and anxiety and agony. In this country, the Jew rejoices that the Christmas sentiment is speedily and beautifully progressing toward realization in action. And when he sees the lights leap into glory in his neighbors' homes he breathes forth a fervent prayer for their happiness. He gladly contributes his part to the happiness of his friends, and such as share with him the hospitality of his domestic heart, but are not of his religious fraternity. For himself and his own, however, as yet he prefers to wait."—Leslie's Weekly.

Ask God to give thee skill
In comfort's art,
That thou mayest consecrated be,
And set apart
Unto a life of sympathy;
For heavy is the weight of ill
In every heart,
And comforters are needed much Of Christlike touch.

—W. K. Bryce.

A Christmas Meditation.

As the Wise Men of old left their wisdom and the shepherds their shepherding, to seek Him who was to be the Wisdom of God and the Shepherd of the wandering sheep of God; so may we, leaving our boasted wisdom and our petty businesses, seek after Him, and rest not till we have found Him.

As the lowly manger of Bethlehem found room for the newborn King, may we, in humble hearts, find room for him, Crowned and Glorified.

May our eyes be open to the light of the Star of Truth whom the lesser star heralded at Bethlehem.

May our ears be attuned to the angels' song, reechoed to-day by millions of humanity, that we, too, may sing, not with our lips, but with minds, hearts and hands, the matchless strain, "Peace on earth, good will among men."

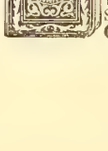
Thomas Curtis Clark.

Do You Discourage People?

"Our brethren have discouraged our heart."—Deuteronomy 1:28.

We want a host of men to be encouragers, because there are plenty of the other sort in the world. Discouragers put out lamps. Wanted, a few men to trim wicks! Discouragers quench fires. Wanted, a few men to make them burn! Discouragers depreciate genius. Wanted, a few men to appreciate talent! Discouragers slap the weak in the face. Wanted, a few men to take them by the hand and help them along the journey of life!

A young naval officer, now occupying a good position, felt nervous and weak the first time he took part in an engagement. The captain of the vessel, noticing the young man tremble, went forward and spoke some words like these in his ear: "Do not be excited, keep as cool as you can; we have all felt like this in our first encounter with the enemy; you will soon gather courage." The young officer says that these words made him strong, gave him confidence and created bravery. That captain was an encourager. Wanted, a host of encouragers.



A first grade boy brought perfect spelling papers home for several weeks, and then suddenly began to miss five and six out of ten.

"How's this, son?" asked his father.

"Teacher's fault," replied the boy.

"How is it the teacher's fault?"

"She moved the little boy that sat next to me."—Lippincott's.

The Squire's Christmas

By Arthur Ward Barnes.

The Squire stirred in his sleep, half conscious of a sound of music, and wondering dreamily where he was. Then partially awakening, he stared at the windows where the first glimmer of early dawn was faintly visible.

Clearly the tones rang out of the gloom, blending in gladness, as note after note rose to the closing strain, "Glory be to God on high!" It almost seemed to the listener that he might be in heaven, and the song an echo from the "Golden Gates."

But fully aroused at last, and hearing again the sweet refrain, he realized that the voices were human and undoubtedly those of the English workmen from the shops, singing their customary Christmas carols. With a glowing heart he slipped out of bed, groping into his slippers, and wrapping a blanket around him on his way to the window. "God bless you!" he cried. "'Tis very sweet. I thank you all."

And hearty voices came answering through the dusk, "A merry Christmas, Squire!"

"A merry Christmas!" repeated the Squire, mechanically, as he lay down again. The carol grew fainter and fainter as the songsters passed out of the big gate and down the street, till at last only the low murmur, "to God on high," came back to the lonely man.

The Squire wasn't given to indulgence in gloomy reflections, but in the quiet of the room, broken only by the persistent ticking of the clock, and its silvery strokes as it chimed the hour, sad thoughts of the changes wrought in one short year would obtrude themselves. Twice within a twelfth-month had the grim shadow fallen on the home. The loved wife—mistress of his heart for many years—and the idolized daughter had passed on to the Better Land. And there would be another vacant chair to-day, that of the soldier-son. Handsome and full of life, he had left them, but even before the smoke of Philippine warfare had cleared away, Colonel Fred Hansen's name had appeared on the list of the dead.

And now Christmas had come again! The day to think of "glad tidings of great joy," and to tell the children the story of the Baby King, born in Bethlehem. How long the day would seem, with three dear ones gone from the home.

Still, it would never do to seem sad on Christmas morning, thought the Squire, as he came down to breakfast, looking the "peace on earth" from his kind eyes. He viewed with approval the holly wreaths that hung in the windows, and busied himself with a great show of interest in untying the pink strings on several mysterious packages around his plate, not forgetting to render cordial thanks to Mrs. Ray, his housekeeper, for her kind Christmas remembrances.

The Squire was usually a busy man, and the sorer his trouble the more entirely he employed heart, mind and body. He always did much for others, and had he a hundred extra ways to help those who needed help at Christmas time? He was fairly idolized by the men at the works. You never knew a man who was employed at Hansen's Machine Shops to dream of striking. That would have been foolish indeed, for the Squire always said: "My men must share in my prosperity," and he lived up to this sentiment, too.

This year he had been a regular Old Father Christmas, a Santa Claus of liberality. The chickens and turkeys of Northampton would have trembled, if they could have seen him on his still hunt for poultry with Grocer Harris. The Squire was a great man for turkeys, as every man in the shops with a family had reason to know, and it seemed as though those toothsome birds must have been turned out to order they were so invariably plump and tender, when they knocked at the doors of the houses to which they were sent. In fact, a slim or lean fowl was never mustered into the Squire's service.

After breakfast this morning, Mrs. Ray announced Deacon Sanderson. Sanderson knew his man, and meant to help him forget his loneliness. So putting on a long face, he told the Squire a pitiful story about a widow who was in sore straits for coal and wood, and nearly everything else. "I thought perhaps you'd like to go and see her," he suggested.

Of course, the Squire would go. Nearly a mile away in a house on Yellow Row—which wasn't an aristocratic row by any means—Widow Merritt was getting breakfast. It wasn't what would be considered a very filling meal for three children and a woman, even if the latter was small and thin, nor was it a tremendously roaring fire by which the aforesaid meal was being prepared. "Getting breakfast" translated meant, trying to toast a few thin slices of bread over a fire that was twenty parts smoke to one part blaze; and warming some water, while cherishing the hopes that Biddy Logan who lived next door might lend them her goat a few minutes—that is, if her baby wasn't too hungry. The connection between the goat and the water was, that if the goat wasn't all milked out, Tommy Merritee would get a small cupful of milk from that obliging animal, which, brewed with water, was dignified by the name of tea.

But though the goat came to the back door, the milk wouldn't come to the cup. So, milkless and almost fireless, the family was huddled around the stove, muffled in garments of odd and irrevelant appearance.

Short Peter, who even in most troublous times was gamey and gay, had for his head piece an old tall hat, which was expected to rest gracefully on the back of his head, so that he could look out in front, from beneath it, but in moments of excitement it often fell down, almost extinguishing the little fellow, and he would gyrate wildly around the room without much in evidence but the hat, till somebody came to the rescue.

Sister Lutie, nine years old, was wrapped in a voluminous ulster, much the worse for wear.

Sober Tom insisted that papers were warming. Hence his legs and arms were tied up in old copies of "The Boston Herald," and a Sunday edition of "The Post" did duty as an outside wrap.

You should have been there three hours later! "Listen to that, will yer, Tommy?" and a tall hat on a small pair of legs came charging across the room to a corner where Master Tommy, seated on a bag of flour, was blissfully munching candy.

"That" was a sound of sausages sizzling in a pan on the stove, where a real fire was snapping merrily.

"Yes! and smell! smell!" yelled Tommy, lifting a freckled snub nose in the air. Ah! it was the smell of coffee, good coffee slowly and delightfully permeating the atmosphere. There had been milk for the coffee, too, but those youngsters, like regular topers, had drained the can dry almost as soon as it arrived.

Deacon Sanderson was piling up wood behind the stove, and there was an abundance of both coal and wood in the shed outside. You couldn't see your breath anywhere in the room now.

And here comes the Squire again, puffing with his exertions, and soon a little mountain of provisions, capped by a handsome turkey, looms up beside the sack of flour. Peter was almost overcome at that turkey. He fondled and hugged it, sighing with expectant joy at thought of the greater pleasure of helping to dissect it.

The continued eruptions of the impurities of the blood through the skin of the face and other parts of the body in the form of pimples, blackheads, boils, fleshworms, eczema, blotches, blemishes, scabby crusts, scrofula, salt rheum, simple and chronic acne, poisoned skin, red skin or rash or spots, ulcers, carbuncles, etc., if allowed to continue indefinitely, will eventually destroy the skin so as to permanently disfigure your face and body. The glands in the skin, containing fluids and fatty secretions necessary for the nourishment of the skin, are often destroyed by continued eruptions, thus causing fissures, cracks and scars, and leaving the skin in a dried and shrunken condition.

The appetizing smells had even slipped out a little at the door, and Hannah, the goat, convinced that here was something worthy of her attention, was baaing on the step for admission.

Lutie hadn't much to say during this exciting time, but when their benefactors were leaving, the little girl looked earnestly at the Squire and piped out in a shaky voice: "I guess you must be an angel. It wasn't Christmas here this mornin', but 'tis now!"

And Tommy added, unwinding layers of papers from his legs, "Yes, an' it's gettin' too hot for papers."

For several days the puffing iron steed had been bringing nearer and nearer to a New England village a pale-faced traveler, in faded blue uniform, who eagerly watched the all too slowly changing scenery from the car window. Leaning back wearily in his seat he sighed, "If only I can get home to Christmas! Oh! to see a stone wall again, and bending elms, though the branches are bare, and the fir trees in the front yard, and to listen to the blue jays out back of the house. Even to hear the clang of the bells calling the men to the shops, would be a treat, while I lie in bed half awake in the morning. Will I ever, ever get there!"

It was Christmas night. The stars shone brightly down on Northampton village, and looking up into the twinkling dome of blue, one might imagine that the heavenly hosts were not far away, and that "good will toward men" was drawing nearer. Beneath, bells jingled merrily as sleighs dashed up and down the streets; the snow creaked with crispy frostiness under the feet of pedestrians; every window of the Squire's great house was throwing beams of light into the snowy yard; and hurrying up the pathway with eager strides was the traveler in blue.

The Squire, sitting before the fire within, was busy with the past. Someway his mind dwelt particularly on the soldier-lad. What a handsome little fellow he had been! He recalled a hundred of his boyish pranks, and then sighed at the thought of the young manhood sacrificed so soon. Would that he might hear again even a word from the voices of his loved and lost. He yearned for the boy more than ever now that he was growing old. Yes, he was a little lonely.

A ring at the door! A caller! The Squire wondered who it might be. What! a soldier? He couldn't believe his eyes. They must be playing him false. He dared not move, lest the apparition vanish. But listen! Sweeter than the morning song was the sound that fell on his ear. It was the soldier's "Father!" that brought the Squire to his feet.

Fred, his boy, alive and at home! The loneliness faded out of the room. Christmas was all about them. It sang in the sizzling pine knots that seemed just to have crackled up the chimney. "Home again! Home again!"

Fred told a common story of war days, a story of wounds, capture, imprisonment and escape. His letters had miscarried, and his telegram arrived an hour after he did.

And now the village must hear the news, and quickly the bells rang out, shivering the air into splinters of joy, echoing the glad tidings far and far. The neighbors, the men from the works, their wives and children, all eager to give more than a Christmas welcome to Colonel Fred, and a double handshake to the Squire, who seemed years younger in his great happiness. The lights of the village fade, the chiming bells are asleep, but the embers of that Christmastide shine softly through the shadows of the past.—N. Y. Observer.

THE CHEER OF CHRISTMAS.

Now the Christmas comes to charm us
With its blessedness and cheer,
And the halo of its glory
Fitly crowns the aged year;
And the world puts by its troubles,
And the world forgets its pain,
And the signs give place to smiling,
When the Christmas comes again.

For the selfish lose their grasping,
And the turbulent grow mild,
And the old grow young and mirthful—
Of their weariness beguiled,
When the holly decks the windows,
And the mistletoe is hung,
And the children sing the carols,
And the chiming bells are rung.

Oh, these days of wondrous sweetness,
That make up the Christmastide!
Days of loving and forgiving,
And of scattering bounties wide—
When this festival of blessing
Glorifies the waning year,
And we all become kind-hearted
In the merry Christmas cheer!

THE NIXEY CLERK

BY JEAN K. BAIRD.

There was a stillness about the house which was foreboding. The mother sat with idle hands by the fireside. Her gaze was fixed upon the coals. She was very sad and lonely. She made no effort to shake off the gloom which enveloped her like a cloud. Her spirits affected the little girl Laura, who was playing quietly in a corner of the room. Naturally the child was like a sunbeam, dancing merrily about and carrying brightness with her everywhere. But she had learned much in the last two weeks. The greatest of all was that her laughter and noise disturbed both her father and mother.

The tears which she had seen fill their eyes had touched her. She knew the reason for them, and yet she could not quite grasp their present actions with what they had told her. If her little brother had gone to heaven, and heaven was a most beautiful land where every one was well and happy, as they had told her, why should they weep? She missed him all day. She needed him in all the games she played, but she did not sit quiet and cry as her mother did.

Within the last few weeks she had taught herself to play games, which made no noise and where no laughter crept in.

Now she put her doll to bed, kissing it to sleep instead of lulling it to slumber with songs, as she was accustomed to do.

Her brother's rocking-horse, his drum and ball lay in one corner of the room where he had left them last. She would have played with them had she been allowed. Surely he would not care. He had finer things in heaven than these. But her mother had forbade her touching them. They were to be left just as the little brother had last played with them.

She heard her father's step on the porch. The night was cold and the boards snapped under his feet with frost. He stepped slowly, although the air was bitter cold.

"How he used to come so quick," said the child to herself. "But now it's slow. Maybe he doesn't care to come home since the baby's gone."

She heard the street door open and close. Her father was in the hall removing his heavy stormcoat. She knew what would happen when he came into the room. She dreaded the tears and the sad looks. To avoid them she crawled back under the davenport and hid herself quite from view. She did not wish to see her mother weep and hear her father's vain attempts at comforting her.

Before she knew what had happened she was crying softly; and she was quite a big girl, too, being almost seven and having been in school a whole year.

She peeped from her hiding place. Her father stood with his arms close about her mother and the eyes of both were filled with tears.

"I felt as though I could never come back into the house," he was saying. "I walked squares out of my way to-night."

"Yet I am here. We must bear this together," sobbed his wife. "We must bear up."

"There's his rocking-horse. Do you remember how pleased he was when it was sent home?"

"I could scarcely get him to bed that night. He wanted to stay up all night and ride," said the child's mother.

The faces of both lighted up as they spoke.

"He'll never ride it again," said the father. "I can't bear it. To think that you and I must live without him."

"They have me," said the child under the davenport to herself. "I wonder if they have forgotten that they have me?" She might have ventured out to tell them that she was yet left to them, had not the conversation continued, and she paused to listen.

"But, Harry, you must bear up. Do for my sake. As long as we have each other—" she could not finish, but began to sob aloud. "It won't be long," she added after a moment.

"Only eternity will help me," he said.

The face of the child lighted up at these words. Her heart gave a great bound. She crawled from her hiding place and followed her parents to the dining room. She could scarce refrain from dancing, for her heart had grown light.

During the meal she looked from father to mother. Their tear-stained faces no longer distressed her. She knew the panacea for their grief. She meant to get it for them.

The Christmas season is a busy time for the "Nixey clerk" in the postoffice of a large city. To him come all misaddressed and undeliverable letters. At this season from all sections of the city come thousands of letters addressed to Santa Claus.

The Nixey Clerk was busy. Letters were piling up thick before him. He was getting back in his work. He found that his sorrow was lessening the agility of his fingers and the keenness of his eyes. His mind wandered from his work before him to the home—a sad, dreary home it was with his boy no longer there. There were moments when he felt that he must leave the office and hurry home to see if it were really true that his child had been called away.

He hated the sight of the Christmas letters. The childish missives kept his own trouble fresh in his mind.

Christmas! How he abhorred the thought of it. There could be no Christmas in their lonely home.

Just then the mail men came in with their bundles of letters for the "Nixey." One of the men waited to speak to him. "This might interest you," he said. "This letter is addressed to Santa Claus. It was handed me in person by the writer. I think you'll be justified in reading it and answering it, too, for that matter."

He handed the letter to the Nixey Clerk. The envelope was not the cleanest. The address was misspelled and badly written in the crude, vertical script of an untrained hand.

"Why should it interest me?" he asked of the carrier.

"Because it was mailed at 324 Elm street."

"Oh, my own house: very well." He slipped the letter into his pocket and went back to his work. When the carriers had returned to the main office and he was alone, he read the letter. It was filled with misspelled words and misplaced capitals.

"dere Santa Clause," it ran, "I rote you thre or for letters to bring me presens. but you don't nede to bring eny for me. I wood rather you wood bring papa some eternite if you have some, for only that will make him well."

His own little daughter's name was signed to this. He slipped the letter back into his pocket and turned again to his work. The carriers came and went. The routine of a great city office was continued. The Nixey Clerk sorted letters by the thousand until the time came for that department to close for the day.

This evening as he entered the house he did not forget the little daughter who played in the corner by herself. He watched her as, all unconscious of his scrutiny, she put her small family to bed. Her face was alight with childish hope and anticipated pleasure. Santa Claus had always brought her what she had asked for, and surely he would not refuse a little bit of eternity, especially when she had volunteered to forego her own gifts. Such thoughts as these went flitting through her mind and reflected themselves on her face.

"Come here, Laura," said her father at last. "Come, tell me what Santa Claus will bring you this year."

She came and climbed on his knee. "I don't believe he's going to bring me anything," she replied.

"Not anything? Why, how is that? He has always remembered you so generously."

She could not tell him the reason for her answer. She tried to parry the question.

"I—I—just thought he might—might—not. That's why."

In spite of all his questioning that was the reply her father received.

When she was in bed beyond hearing, her father read the letter to his wife as she sat tearful and sad by the fireside. The disregard for self expressed in the letter opened their eyes to questions which they had not considered before. Their little daughter had declared herself ready to forego her own pleasure for their good.

Were they more selfish than she? Their son had been taken from them. That fact was ever present in their minds; but one was left to them. Had they no duty to fulfill toward her?

They sat until midnight discussing these matters as never before. Their views broadened. New thoughts and resolutions came to them.

"We must remember our little girl," said the father. "Never again must we indulge our grief to her neglect."

"She must fill the place of both children," said his wife. "We must make this Christmas doubly dear to her."

Laura awoke early Christmas morning; but she did not jump from the bed and hurry down to see what Santa Claus had brought her. She felt that he had accepted her last letter in good faith. She would have no presents, but her father would be cured of being sorry. She was quite wide awake and thinking seriously of these matters, when her father called from the hall below:

"Are you awake, Lazybird? Come down and see what has happened."

She knew without his telling her. The little bit of eternity had come and he was already cured. She knew that by his voice. It had been weeks since it had rang out so loud and cheery.

She did not wait to dress. Springing from bed she ran quickly downstairs and into the living room, wondering all the time what eternity would look like.

"Where is it?" she asked eagerly. "There," replied her father, pointing to where stood a tree resplendent with tinsel and bright balls.

She held her breath. The tree alone was not a surprise; but it stood where the rocking-horse, the ball and the drum had been but the evening before.

Her father read her face, and answered the question she could not put into words. "Yes, they are gone. I sent them to a boy down on Water street—a little fellow no bigger than your brother. It seemed foolish to keep them when they could make some one else happy. Don't you think so?"

She nodded. She was almost afraid to speak.

"Did Santa Claus bring you anything?" she asked. It was really a useless question. She knew, of course, that he had brought it. Did not its possession account for this great change in her father.

He nodded his head, as though he knew much that he would not tell. He tapped his pocket with his fingers. "Did he bring me anything? Well, I should say so. It came to me through the mail yesterday, direct from Santa Claus. I keep it in my coat pocket. It's very valuable. I felt better the moment I received it."

It was good to hear him laugh. She laughed with him. She ran then to seize upon her own gifts. She would never, never tell him that it was through her that he had received his little piece of eternity.

Is There a Santa Claus?

Why land's sake, child, of couse they is. I reckon I've saw him nigh onto a hundred times myself—and he'll be here directly, too. He's jest a whoopin' down across them icebergs on his way here, licketty split, an' you betchy he'll be here on time, too. Never knowed him to fail yit, an' I reckon they ain't nobody's had more experience in these matters than me. No, course you ain't saw him yourself, but you got a pur-r-ty fair idee how he looks, now hain't you? Sure! I knowed you had. Why, I ree-collect jest as well's 'twas yestiddy the first time I see him. Let's see, what year was that? Um-m. Brother Jim was born in—well, if I hain't clean forgotten. Well, well, well, 'pears like my memry's kind o' failin' me on little things like that, but when it comes to Santy Claus—you betchy I don't forgit anything about him.

I kin dee-scribe old Santy with my eyes shet. Tall? No, not exactly tall. Kind of little squatty roly-poly feller if I remember right, with the funniest little eyes you ever see. Reg'lar little weasel eyes, but so full o' fun that they just plum brim over and spill out on his cheeks. Not what you'd call a real handsome man—but, oh, powerful good natured. Jest do anythin' fer you if he takes a shine to you. If you're real good an'—

How? How do I know he's comin'? Well, well, well, jest listen to the child. How do I know! Why bless ye, I know the signs as well as I know beans. You know how a new Noey's Ark smells, don't ye? Well, that's one of the signs. Whenever you go down to the store and ketch a whiff o' new Noey's Arks, you c'n make up your mind that old Santy's powerful imminent. And another thing, too. Along in the late fall when th' year's gettin' kinda old an' decrepid like, just hoppin' along tow'd December, you can jest taste the Santy Claus feelin' in th' air. "You better begin gettin' ready," sez he, and off he goes, an' along comes a whole bunch of 'em, each gettin' ex-asperated. I tell ye the excitement is jest about near the bustin' point by the twenty-fourth of December. If Chris'mas had came two days later the strain would be too much. Old Nature would jest throw up both hands an' call in th' doctor. But you see they figgered on this, so Chris'mas comes two days earlier than it would if it come two days later, an' so everybody manages to live through it safely. Talk about excitement! Why, the buzz o' children talkin' an' the thumpin' of little hearts on the night afore Chris'mas is enough t' plum drown'd out the sound o' sleighbells, to say nothin' o' th' crunch o' fur boots on the housetops.

How old? Let's see, I used to know—almost to a day. I reckon about a thousan' years, more or less. I first heerd o' him when I was 'bout three years old—that makes him at least 69 years old. You heerd of him when you was 3, an' you're 6 now. That's three years more, so atween us two he's 72 years at least. Your brother heerd o' him when he was 3, an' he's 10 now. So there's seven years more. It's kinda hard to calculate, offhand. You see, you got to 'low fer th' difference in time, as th' feller said. F'r instance, when it's 10 o'clock out there in Chiny, it's yistiddy or to-morrow here. All them things has got to be took in consideration when you figger out how old Santy is. I reckon I'm safe in sayin' he's purty well past middle age anyhow, ef the truth be known. But the funny part is he's got a heart like a little child, jest as young an' happy as a chipmunk. He's more fun 'n a box of monkeys. He al'ays dresses in red clothes with a little red cap all trimmed with white wool. I reckon this wool was gathered by the children friends of hisn. Wool-gatherers. Hi-jiminy, that's funny. I never thought o' that before.

Well, as I was sayin', old Santy is a pretty busy man, in season an' out. You might think that President Roos-velt was busy, but he hain't a patch alongside o' Santy. Why, I reckon he has to keep tab on nearly a hundred million thousand children, from one end of Chris'endom to the other. An' he has to take presents to all of them. Now, f'r instance, sposin' they was five hundred million thousand children, an' s'posin' each one of 'em lived a mile apart, there you have five hundred thousand million miles, all to be covered in one night. That's a right smart chore, I tell you what—a pretty big ja'nt, when you figger delays an' sech. So he appints assistants—deppity Santys, so to speak, two or three to every fam'ly. These here deppity Santys do all the work an' give Santy all th' credit, so's to cause no ill feelin'. These deppities keep track of all th' different children. Ever' time a little tad wishes f'r anything one o' these deppity Santys makes a memorandum of it an' goes out an' gets it. F'r instance, ef a little kid, one of these little Storkites, mumbles somethin' or other, th' lady deppity Santy translates it to mean "doll," or somethin' o' that sort. Sometimes a little kid sez he wants a pony or a train o' cars, an' if the house is very small th' lady deppity has t' translate it to mean "rubber ball" or some little jimcrack o' that sort.

You c'n see these deppity Santys downtown every day in December, hustlin' around like a chicken with its head off, tiein' bundles an' spendin' money to beat the Old Harry. Yer ma's a deppity Santy. So's yer pa. I used t' be but I hain't been workin' much o' late years. Reckon I ain't spry enough t' tackle them big stores an' the crowds o' folks.

Oh, yes, the toys. Well, old Santy has a wonderful workshop, leastways they say he has. I read it in a picture book. Well, anyway, they say that this here shop is quite wonderful—has three doors, one for Santy to go in, and one for him to come out, so's to avoid runnin' into himself, and one t' keep burglars out. Kinda funny arrangement, ain't it? He got a hired man t' make th' toys. This party makes all the toys an' hangs 'em out on the Ar'tic circle to dry, an' along comes old Mr. Northwind and dries 'em. When they are all ready for delivery, Santy hists 'em on his back an' goes kitin' away in his sleigh to fill up these stockin's I was speakin' of. Lots o' little detectives set up an' try to ketch him when he comes along, but none of 'em ever succeed. He's too sharp fer 'em. You see he sends along old Mr. Sand Man, who puts 'em all to sleep jest afore he comes, so he never gets ketched. Sometimes he can't get into a house on account of the Wolf. Lots of little houses have wolves at the door—not t' keep people away, but wolves that want t' get inside t' eat up everybody inside. Sometimes Santy gets scared away by a wolf, an' the little stockin's inside don't get anything in 'em.* * * *

Well, land's sake, 4 o'clock! Who'd a thought it was so late? Run along now, child, an'—don't tell your ma what I've been tellin' you. Get her t' tell you about th' little Chris'mas Boy that lived a long time ago. That's a beautiful story fer you to hear, lots nicer n th' Santy story. You get her t' tell it to you.—John T. McCutcheon in Appleton's Magazine.

—Thanks to the practical friendship of thousands of Disciples all over our land, as well as the excellent work done by our editors, publishers, printers, buyers and salesmen, we are closing out the greatest year's business in the history of this House. The circulation of our papers and Bible school literature exceeds that of any previous year by many thousands of copies. Our book and church supply sales are far in excess of the record breakers of past years. For this we are very grateful and promise our patrons renewed and even more studious efforts to please them through the coming years.

—Naturally the churches in our college towns will be careful and critical in the selection of Bible school literature, not only because of its helpfulness to the resident membership, but also by reason of its influence on the student body from which are sent forth the young ministers to our churches. In these college towns, too, you would expect to find the most competent judges of what constitutes the best and safest literature. It will, therefore, occasion no surprise when we say that this House is supplying the great churches at Des Moines, Iowa, Lexington, Ky., Hiram, Ohio, Enid, Okla., Berkeley, Cal., Charlottesville, Va., Eugene, Wash., and Waco, Texas, the seats of our great colleges, universities and Bible chairs. Ought not this fact to be taken into consideration by you in ordering literature for your Bible school?

Special Notice to Our Subscribers

There has appeared in our daily papers a special dispatch from Washington, D. C., purporting to give a new ruling from the Post Office Department with regard to mailing papers to subscribers in arrears. We print below that part of the dispatch dealing with delinquent subscribers.

Washington, December 9.—Postmaster General Meyer to-day promulgated his new regulations relative to the second-class mailing privilege, which will become effective on January 1.

The section of the regulations which fixes the time a publication may be sent to a person without a renewal of subscription follows:

"A reasonable time will be allowed publishers to secure renewals of subscriptions, but unless subscriptions are expressly renewed after the term for which they are paid, within the following periods—

"Dailies, within three months; triweeklies, within six months; semiweeklies, within nine months; weeklies, within one year; semimontalies, within three months; monthlies, within four months; bimonthlies, within six months; quarterlies, within six months—

"They shall not be counted in the legitimate list of subscribers, and copies mailed on account thereof shall not be accepted for mailing at the second-class postage rate of 1 cent a pound, but may be mailed at the transient second-class postage rate of 1 cent for each four ounces or fraction thereof, prepaid by stamps affixed. The right of a publisher to extend credit for subscriptions to his publication is not denied or questioned, but his compliance or noncompliance with this regulation will be taken into consideration in determining whether the publication is entitled to transmission at the second-class postage rates."

Referring to the above, we urge our subscribers who are in arrears, to remit to us at once, so that it will not be necessary for us to discontinue sending them THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The little yellow label on the front cover page will show you the date to which your subscription is paid.

WHAT FRIENDS ARE SAYING.

You make me poor. Every blessed week there is a list of books that I want. And some of them I have to buy. You tantalize me.

I must read the new volume of sermons by Brandt. Send me a copy. He held a meeting for me years ago, and I think I never heard such a preacher to the hearts of common people.—Charles Bloom, Newman, Ill.

I am afraid I shall have to stop taking THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. It is a dangerous paper. It puts things week by week, just as I believe them, and is making me lazy. I think it a bad thing for a man to constantly read a paper, every item in which he agrees with. But I'll stand it a while longer.

The Cross and Crown System is demanding more supplies but has more than doubled our Sunday-school contributions. It has brought young people in our Sunday-school who formerly thought they were too old to attend. They are as much interested and as eager to secure the souvenir pins as others. The Cross and Crown System pays.—G. D. King, Porterville, Cal.

I am a subscriber to your excellent paper since last March and have learned much concerning your faith. Opposition to the Disciples would soon vanish if you had wider circulation. I would like to see it in every home in the United States and Canada. I was opposed to your belief a year ago. I have studied your basis and history from your paper and Baptist history, and am now praying and intend to assist your movement in my own sphere of influence and denomination. When at Buffalo Plains my brother (an evangelist of your body in West Virginia) assisted me in a successful series of meetings in a private house. In two weeks 32 confessed Christ and 13 of them were buried with Christ in baptism. A church, either Baptist, Disciple or union, will be organized soon.—W. U. Pickle, Midvale, Sask., Canada.

A WEEKLY RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPER.

ST. LOUIS, DECEMBER 26, 1907.

I CARE not what the approaching year brings, if it only results in good. I care not though it may be undriven, like a chariot whose driver has been thrown to the ground, if God only sits and holds the coursers of Time. If God is in the chariot, I care not what else is in it, or around it. If God will take care of my thoughts and feelings; if he will mark out my ways, and lead me in them; if he will appoint my burdens; if he will send me stores sweetened with his love; if he will give to my faith the vision of eternal life; if he will touch and refine my affections; if he will direct my aspirations toward the heavenly estate—if he will do these things, I shall be content, and shall rejoice, in whatever scenes I may be called to pass through. submit to the Divine will.—Henry Ward Beecher.

WHAT WE STAND FOR.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing,
And the song of victory.

Current Events

Congress has gotten through the first part of its session—the part before the Christmas recess, which is considered a sort of prologue to the real work of the session—with surprisingly little to show for it. Perhaps we ought not to say that it is surprising, for it is hard to feel surprise at any inactivity on the part of Congress. So far as outsiders can observe, there is no prospect of any very immediate currency legislation. When the panic, or the stringency, or the crisis, or whatever one pleases to call the late financial disturbance, was at its height, there was a popular impression which the bankers seemed to share and to encourage, that when Congress met there would be some instantaneous legislation to relieve the situation. It was anticipated that a satisfactory plan would be worked out before Congress met, so that it might be enacted into law with a minimum of delay. But it has become quite evident that, while there is a general agreement that something ought to be done, there is a wide variety of equally authoritative opinions as to what ought to be done. This being the case, perhaps it is just as well for Congress to go slow. We are not disposed to share the cynical opinions which are commonly expressed about the members of our national legislative body. Most of them are able and well-informed gentlemen who fairly represent the political opinions and moral sentiments of their constituents. But if there is any task for which the average congressman is more meagerly equipped than he is for drawing up a tariff schedule, it is the task of formulating or intelligently considering currency legislation. That this is true, is not at all to the discredit of the congressmen. They were not elected because they were eminent specialists in economics or finance, and it would be as unfair to expect them to be equipped with expert knowledge of these matters as to expect them to be able to direct the engineering details of the construction of the Panama Canal.

A man who is so busy doing his whole duty as a governor that he cannot allow his attention to be diverted to a campaign for the presidency, is a surprising anomaly. Governor Hughes is the man. The chairman of a Republican county committee in New York had written to Governor Hughes to offer his services in pushing his presidential boom and asking for instructions as to how he and his committee should proceed in order to make themselves most useful in forwarding his candidacy. The Governor's reply indicates that his presidential boom is a matter of very minor concern to him at present. He refuses to work for himself or to instruct any one else to work for him. He is busy attending to his work as governor and he assumes that the committeemen and delegates will attend to their respective duties in like good conscience. His letter is so unusual that it is worth reproducing. He says:

Hughes as a Candidate.

"My Dear Senator:—Your letter of the 15th has been received. I do not think it proper for me to make any suggestions as to what the county committee should do or not do. I stated my attitude in my speech before the Republican club and by that I stand. It is of the highest importance that the work of the administration shall be disinterested, and I shall do nothing to influence the selection or vote of delegates. I assume that the party representatives will take such action, whatever it may be, as they believe to be best. They have their duty and I have mine. I think my position is clearly understood.

"Very truly yours,
"Charles E. Hughes."

His position is very clearly understood, and it is about the only position of which that can be said. The President's position is not clear. He will not be a candidate himself, but no one knows how the influence of the administration will be used in the campaign. Taft's position is somewhat ambiguous, because it is not known whether he will make the fight as the administration candidate or will leave the cabinet and go it alone. Cortelyou's position is decidedly unclear, for while it is reported that he and his friends have already begun lining up the southern delegates, he has not yet declared whether he would be a candidate at all or not.

The five Nobel prizes for this year have been awarded as follows: To Rudyard Kipling for the best work in pure literature; to Professor Michelson of the University of Chicago, who has devised instruments of great precision for measuring the velocity of light, for the best original work in physics; to Prof. Buchner, of the University of Berlin for the most important contribution to the science of chemistry; to Dr. Laverson, of Paris, for the most valuable discovery in medicine, which consisted of a study of tropical fevers and the influence of mosquitoes in carrying them; and to Signor Moneta of Italy and Prof. Renault of France (the fifth prize being divided) for the advancement of peace. It will be remembered that these five prizes, amounting to about $40,000 each, are given annually by the will of the late Alfred Nobel, the inventor of dynamite. The will provided that the prizes should be awarded to the persons who, during the preceding year, had contributed most to the advancement of the world in the five directions mentioned. While the persons who have received the prizes have always been men of great distinction, the intention of the donor in one respect has not been carried out. The prizes have been given as rewards to the veterans of science, men who in some cases have not done a new thing for a generation, rather than as incentives to the younger men who are doing the original work of to-day. It is safe to say, for example, that the award to Mr. Kipling, gratifying as it must be to his many friends who consider him the real poet laureate of England, was not made on the ground of the transcendent value of any contribution which he has made to literature during the past year.

King Oscar, of Sweden, who died on December 8 and was buried with impressive ceremonies in Stockholm, on December 19, was a much loved monarch. He was a grandson of Napoleon's Marshal Bernadotte, who became king of Norway and Sweden as Carl Johan, or Charles XIV. King Oscar ruled for thirty-five years. He was statesman, scholar, man of letters, scientist and friend of the people. His son, Gustav V, who has succeeded to the throne, is a man of fifty years and of tastes and habits similar to his father's. The separation of Norway from Sweden and the establishment of a separate king for the smaller country was a cause of much grief to the good old king, but it gave him opportunity to display some of his finest traits. It is largely due to his wise counsel and pacific influence that the threatened war between the two countries was averted. During a great part of his reign, King Oscar was contemporary with Queen Victoria, King Christian IX of Denmark and Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria. Of this group of veteran monarchs, only Joseph now remains.

The following virtuous sentiment comes from a somewhat surprising source: "Obedience to law is essential to the continuation of our institution, and no fact in our history, as recorded from day to day, is more lamentable than the failure on the part of the states and municipalities to enforce the edicts of society as expressed on our statute books. As citizens, we deplore the nonobservance of laws. We insist that saloonkeepers shall obey all laws or else be retired." This sound gospel of obedience to law is found in a circular put forth by an association of wholesale liquor dealers which recently met in Milwaukee. We wonder if they mean it. Perhaps they do. Perhaps they see the handwriting on the wall. Perhaps the astonishing and (to them)

Editorial

An Old Year Meditation.

Of the two good angels who minister to us in our earthly toils and labors—Memory and Hope—the first mentioned seems busiest when we sit down to write the closing editorial of the year. It is natural when we come to any event or date that marks the completion of a given task or a given period, to glance backward over the work that has been achieved and over the days and weeks and months in which the task has been accomplished. This is particularly true of the end of the year. It is particularly true in the case of an Editor, when that date synchronizes with the completion of another volume of his paper. To him the end of the year has a double significance, and, may we not add, a double solemnity? At such a time Pilate's words concerning the superscription on the cross acquire a far deeper meaning than the Roman Governor attached to them: "What is written, is written", and one thinks, too, at such a time, of those awful lines of the Rubaiyat:

"The moving finger writes; and, having writ,
Moves on: Nor all your Piety nor Wit
Shall lure it back to cancel half a Line,
Nor all your Tears wash out a Word of it."

But after all, this truth—that we can not possibly recall what is once written and published—is one that should come to us at the beginning rather than at the end of a volume. Indeed, it is a truth that should never be absent from the mind of an editor or of anyone who writes for the public. That this is far from being the case, however, we are warranted in believing by the character of much that we read. It is a habit which was formed by the writer early in his editorial career, to think how any given article would read a year hence, ten years hence, and even after the pen had dropped from his hand, and his work was ended. That such a habit has always served to prevent us from writing what we could wish were unwritten, we can not say; but that it has saved us from writing, or at least from publishing, many things under a passing impulse or provocation, which, later, we should have deeply regretted, we know to be true.

Who of us that look into the future have not often felt embarrassed by the reflection that those who are to come after us, in the future years, can not fail to recognize the limitations of our present knowledge, and our narrow outlook on life? But this is inevitable. We can not anticipate the future very largely. We are the children of the times in which we live. We are "cribbed, cabined and confined" by our time, our environment, our heredity, and by the limitations of education and experience. The world will move on after we have gone; and what we see to-day, as through a glass, darkly, those who come after us will see with clear vision. If they are wise they will not laugh at our partial knowledge, but will measure us by the times in which we lived, and remember that they also have their limitations, and will be judged by those who come after them.

But there is one thing which those who shall live in the future have a right to expect of us, and that is, that we shall not be stupid enough and obstinate enough to regard our partial knowledge as complete, nor so dogmatic and uncharitable as to condemn those who occupy a different point of view from ours, and therefore see some things in a different light. The thing which we condemn most in those who have preceded us is not their imperfect knowledge, but the tone of infallibility which marks many of their deliverances, and the persecuting spirit which grew out of such assumption of infallibility. In so far as this spirit prevailed in science or in religion, all men now condemn it. Let us therefore at least be humble and charitable, since we know only in part and can prophesy only in part, and the future will judge us charitably. It is not given to us to be omniscient, but we can be modest, tolerant and open-minded.

Looking back now over the year that is past and through the volume which is soon to be closed, if we have written an unkind and uncharitable word concerning friend or foe, concerning those within or without our own communion, that is the word we would now erase, if it were possible. That we have sought to foster the spirit of unity and of brotherly love, not only among ourselves, but with all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, we believe our readers will gladly testify. To serve this end we have not defended ourselves against many misrepresentations, being willing to trust to the vindication of time, and to the sense of fairness and of justice which most people possess. We have felt, for many years, and never more so than now, that the greatest heresy among us is that of the heart, rather than of the head; the heresy of unkindness, of unfairness, of intolerance, to which our poor human nature is so much prone. That we can be sound in faith, and sound in charity also, and that we can not be sound in the one without being sound in the other, is a truth we profoundly believe, and, in a feeble way, have tried to illustrate.

But the year is ended, and we close the forty-fourth volume of the old Christian-Evangelist, which, we are glad to say, has yet the dew of its youth upon it, and is looking forward to long years of faithful service in the kingdom of God. With gratitude to God for his unfailing kindness to us during the year past; and for the health and strength he has vouchsafed to us for daily tasks and daily burdens; with good-will to all, and malice toward none, we turn from this backward glance to face the duties of the New Year.

A Study of Our Present-Day Problems.

I. The Laymen's Movement.

As an introductory problem for our consideration, perhaps there is nothing more pressing or important just now than what is known as the Laymen's Movement—that is, a movement among the men in our churches by which they are to put themselves behind the great enterprises of the church, both local and national. This question began to be agitated among the Disciples of Christ several years ago and special meetings of our men were called in connection with our national conventions to consider the question of organization for more effective work. It was in a meeting of this kind at our Jubilee Convention, in Cincinnati, in 1899, that our lamented Atkinson came to his tragic end by heart-failure, while exhorting his brethren to consecrate more of their time, and thought, and means, to the advancement of the kingdom of God. General Drake also of blessed memory, presided over that meeting. These two men have written their names in imperishable letters in our annals, by the work which they inaugurated—the one in founding a university, and the other in establishing our Board of Ministerial Relief.

In 1903, at our National Convention in St. Louis, a permanent organization was formed and for a year following a great deal of literature on the subject was sent out among the churches, and The Christian-Evangelist gave large space to this new movement among us. For the lack of some one with time and ability to lead the movement it has not taken on large proportions among ourselves, but the seed fell in good soil in other religious bodies in which great organizations of men have been formed which are doing a splendid work. Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and others were quick to see the advantage of banding their men together for aggressive work, and these organizations are already beginning to tell mightily for good. The Baptist organization sent a deputation of laymen to the mission field, which has made its report to the home church, embodying many practical and wise suggestions. The Presbyterian laymen held a National Conference recently in Omaha and pledged a great sum for missions.

Perhaps the most interesting development in this line is the Laymen's Missionary Movement, which is interdenominational in character, and which has for its special object the vast increase of money and men for the foreign field. Meetings are being held in various cities of the country under the leadership of the secretary of this movement, Mr. J. Campbell Whit which are creating a profound impression and awakening a deep interest among the business men in all the churches. The Disciples of Christ will, of course, share in the benefits of this Laymen's Missionary Movement, which aims to greatly increase the contributions to foreign missions through the existing boards of the various religious bodies. But we should not be content with that. We need a national organization among us, with local chapters in the various congregations, the object of which should be the enlistment of all the men of the church in more active service in its behalf, especially their leadership in carrying forward the great enterprises of the church, such as home and foreign missions, education and benevolence. Local organizations should give special attention to local problems, while the national organization would be a mighty factor in pushing forward our general enterprises.

There are reasons underlying this movement which make it clear to us that the Spirit of God is in it, and is going to use it for the accomplishment of great and important purposes in the church. The tasks which confront the church to-day appeal strongly to the virility and heroism of men. The sending of the Gospel to the nations that sit in darkness, and the overthrow of gigantic evils that have entrenched themselves in our so-called Christian civilization, are stupendous enterprises that call for the highest religious statesmanship, for the best business capacity, and for the consecrated energies and means of the business men of the church.

Then again, the enlistment of our men in these great religious enterprises will tend to consecrate all avocations of life and make them seem more sacred in the sight of God. It will help men to see that their business calling, if honestly and legitimately conducted, may be a means of promoting the kingdom of God. This will be great gain to the church and to the men themselves. It is the very best means of saving men of wealth to the church, by bringing them to a realization of their stewardship to God, and in enlisting their time and interest in his work.

Another benefit to the church by the introduction of the lay element into more active service in all the religious bodies, will be the allaying of sectarian feeling and the widening of our plans of work and co-operation. Business men have little patience with our fine-spun theologies when they hinder fraternal co-operation in carrying forward God's work in the world. They will make short work of our already diminishing walls, and will seek to unify our Christian forces in work rather than in doctrinal agreements. Prof. Frank Knight Sanders, speaking on this very subject, has said:

"The infusion of this lay element among those who look at the problems of religious education from a theoretical point of view, is in its last analysis truly and broadly valuable. It makes for economy and directness of effort, for effective organization, for supervisory provisions, and in particular, for a continuing emphasis upon the education and consecration of every normal function of life. There is in the mind of the average layman an impatience with the merely theoretical survey of life, which is not unwholesome. This participation in the working out of religious problems tends also to a normalizing of experiences and duties once regarded as obtainable only in an unusual way."

It was a great advance step when we began to utilize our women in missionary work through the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. It was another great step forward when we learned to utilize the children in mission work, and established Children's Day. It will be another vast stride forward when we learn to harness and use the hitherto unutilized financial strength and business sense of our laymen by giving them something to do, and laying heavy responsibilities upon them. This exceedingly important and practical problem now demands our solution. The way to solve it is to begin at once to form local organizations of men in churches where no such organizations exist, and to hold a great meeting at New Orleans next October to revitalize our national organization and set before it more definite tasks to be performed. We can learn much from our religious neighbors, but we can learn more by actual experience in seriously and earnestly attempting to carry out what seems to be a manifest duty.

Things Which Make for Division.

Since our former editorial on "Things Which Make For Unity," which, by the way, has drawn out many expressions of approval from our readers, our attention has been called to a movement that is going on among the churches in Tennessee which refuse to co-operate in our missionary movements, to effect a formal division. A brief editorial note in the "Gospel Advocate" calling on the brethren to furnish statistics to the United States Census Bureau, which is making an effort to secure statistics of these dissenting churches styled "churches of Christ", attracted our attention, and we wrote Brother Lipscomb asking for further information. We inquired whether he believed that the differences between the brethren he represented and the rest of us, as regards missionary societies and the use of instrumental music in the worship, were sufficient, in his judgment, to justify a division. In his reply he sent us an editorial which appeared in his paper, in its issue of July 18, of the current year, which contains a letter from Director North of the Census Bureau, inquiring "whether there is a religious body called 'church of Christ' not identified with the Disciples of Christ or any other Baptist body." Mr. North wished to know how this body originated and what are its distinctive principles; whether it had any general organization and where was its headquarters. The editor answers that, "There is a distinctive people taking the Word of God as their only and sufficient rule of faith, calling their churches 'churches of Christ' or 'churches of God,' distinct and separate in name, work, and rule of faith from all other bodies or peoples."

This is a most remarkable statement. We doubt if there are many of our readers who had any idea that the work of division had reached this point. It was news to us. We and our readers have been so busily engaged in seeking to promote the kingdom of God on earth and carry forward our great plea for Christian unity that we have failed to take notice of the divisive work that has been going steadily on, it would seem, by those who are willing to make their differences of opinion tests of Christian fellowship and bars of division —the very evil which our movement was intended to remedy. When Brother Lipscomb declares that the churches which he represents are "distinct and separate in name, work, and rule of faith," from the churches engaged in co-operative missionary work, he denies for himself, and those he represents, all the scriptural names of the church given in the New Testament, the work of seeking to convert the world, and the Bible as the rule of faith and practice, for all these are claimed by those from whom he declares separation. By whose authority does Bro. L. make this important pronunciamento? The Census Bureau would do well to raise that question.

All this is as amazing as it is distressing. It shows how the spirit of sectarianism, which we have tried to eliminate from our work, is alive and active in some who are seeking a following at the expense of the unity for which Jesus prayed. But still we plead for the spirit of forbearance and kindliness, especially towards churches and brethren who have been led astray by blind guides. If anything can be done by friendly conference and expostulation, let it, by all means, be done. If all our efforts fail, we can at last fall back on the statement of Paul to the Corinthians: "For there must be also factions among you, that they that are approved may be made manifest among you." (1 Cor. 11:19).

It will be interesting to know where Brother Lipscomb is going to draw a line between the people he designates as "Disciples of Christ" or "Christian Churches," and those he calls "disciples of Christ" or "churches of Christ." It is known that there are other factions which do not recognize Brother Lipscomb as their leader, although they refuse co-operation in our missionary work. We predict that Brother Lipscomb and Director North will have no little difficulty in drawing this line of separation. We still urge that with greater zeal we study and practice the things which make for unity and "mark them which cause division" among us.

Notes and Comments.

The entente cordiale which has been reached between Christian University at Canton, Mo., and Missouri Bible College at Columbia, a statement of which is presented elsewhere, will be very gratifying to the friends of both these institutions and Christian education. There is no reason why the most cordial relations should not exist between these two worthy institutions, and there are many reasons why they should stand together and help each other in the good work which they are seeking to do, each in its own field. These two institutions could give no higher proof of their worthiness of the patronage of the Disciples of Missouri, than this spirit of fraternity and co-operation which they are manifesting, and we bespeak for them the hearty support to which the work they are doing entitles them. The most pressing need we have in Missouri is a greater supply of trained ministers of the Word, and both these institutions are doing excellent work in that direction. Let us hold up their hands.

"We know that God hath spoken to Moses; but as for this man, we know not whence he is." So the Pharisees thought and felt about Jesus. That God could speak to one in their day as he had spoken to Moses in the distant past was, to them, incredible, if not inconceivable. How prone we are to discount the men of our time and magnify those who lived in the long past! It never occurred to these Pharisees to judge Jesus by his character, by his words and by his works, to determine whether God had spoken to him. They held an inherited tradition that God had spoken to Moses; but even that fact does not seem to have been taken up into their understanding, and to have profoundly influenced their lives, for Moses spoke of Christ, whom they rejected. They were therefore rejecting Moses as well as the Christ. But such are they who worship only an "absentee God" who only in the remote past spoke to men. Real faith perceives a living, present God to whom we can speak and who speaks to us to-day.

In a paper on "Our Relations to Other Christians," by Eugene H. Holmes, of Plano, Texas, printed in the "Christian Courier," Dallas, Tex., the author says:

"While federation is a forward step for the denominations, yet in view of our plea and of a century of teaching and training on our part, it would appear as a distinctly backward step for us."

Later on, the writer says:

"It has always been our practice to co-operate with other Christians in all good works of common interest and requiring our united efforts for their accomplishment. It has also been our practice to join with others, upon occasion, in union evangelistic efforts."

The only possible ground, of course, on which to harmonize these two statements is that this writer thinks that federation is something entirely different from co-operation with other religious bodies in "good works requiring united efforts." Let this good brother, and others who feel as he does, just continue to co-operate with their religious neighbors "in all good works of common interest," and call it by any name they please, and we shall have no quarrel.

A minister on the eve of returning to one of the great universities where he has been pursuing some studies, writes us the following:

"My conviction is that my studies, under one or two radical men in ———— university, have done more to ground me in the inexpugnable, evangelical position, than all my work in the past, under anxious defenders of orthodoxy. I have much joy and confidence in the positions which I now occupy and to which I have come through a long process of study, interrupted by periods of pastoral work and teaching. We can never go back to the old uncritical view of the Scriptures. We can not go back to the Old World-view which underlies the theologies of the past centuries. And we have lost none of the grace and truth which came through Jesus Christ. We have not lost God out of the history of Israel, by coming to understand better the mode of his work, even as we have not lost him out of the world by putting him in the steady ongoing of progressive law, rather than in occasional gaps and interruptions thereof."

As long as we have God in the history of Israel, preparing the world for its coming Saviour, and can retain all the grace and truth which came through Jesus Christ, and Christ himself as one with God, and as the Alpha and Omega of Christianity, there is little need for alarm about the foundations of our faith. And only those who have come to such foundations in the light of present-day knowledge are in a position to do the most effective service in defending the faith of the Gospel against the assaults of modern rationalism. We have no doubt, however, that our brother was the better enabled to resist the radicalism of his university teachers by the conservative orthodox training he had received before he went there. The college first, and then the university.

"I have seen it stated that the federation meeting at Norfolk, in connection with our national convention, was 'irregular' because the committee which submitted its report to that gathering was appointed by our last congress at Cincinnati, and should have made its report to that body instead of to a mass meeting. Is that correct?"—K.

It is not correct. The committee reporting at Norfolk was appointed by a mass meeting at Cincinnati, following one of the sessions of the Congress in that city, and it made its report to another mass meeting at Norfolk. Moreover, the committee was appointed at Cincinnati for the express purpose of calling the Norfolk meeting and bringing this question before it for decision. Hence the charge of "irregularity" falls to the ground, along with others.

The question is sometimes asked concerning the proposed federated movement of Protestant churches, 'What can it do?" The Christian Endeavor World gives an excellent summary of what can be accomplished through the proposed federation:

The great interchurch council which met in New York in 1905 formed a plan for the federation of all American Protestant Evangelical churches. When two-thirds of the thirty denominations represented at New York should take favorable action, that plan was to be set in motion.

This two-thirds has been obtained. Thirty denominations or more will enter the federation. December 2-8, 1908,—a year hence,—"The Federal Council of the Church of Christ in America" will hold its first meeting.

What can it do?

Many things. Great things.

It can map out a plan of concerted action against the saloon.

It can unite the churches in favor of a uniform divorce law.

It can mass sentiment for the wise and right observance of the Lord's day.

It can set on foot measures for bringing the churches into more sympathetic relations with working men.

It can devise a great advance in work for the immigrants.

It can raise its voice for international arbitration.

It can plan for a glorious evangelistic campaign.

It can organize such a movement for foreign missions as the world has never yet known.

It can begin at least to plan for the prevention of the needless waste caused by the over multiplication of churches in our small towns.

It can cause the voice of Christians to be heard with a mighty sound.

It can join the hands of Christians with a mighty clasp.

It can co-ordinate and mass the strength of Christians into a mighty effectiveness.

All this it can do, and, we believe, all this it will do. To that end from now till that glorious day in December, 1908, let the hearts of all Christians be joined in fervent prayer. The dream of godly men for centuries is drawing near to glad fulfillment. Christ is about to witness the long-delayed answer to his prayer, "that they all may be one."—

The great sermon by Alexander Whyte, D. D., on "Christian Unity," which has received such wide-spread commendation now appears in a very handsome little booklet under the attractive title, "That They All May Be One," and is published in this country by A. C. Armstrong and Son, New York. Price, 35 cents. We could wish that every minister among us might procure a copy of this sermon, and not only read, but study it, until he fully imbibed its spirit, for it is the spirit of the sermon, rather than any new teaching on the basis of union in it, that is most valuable. "What kind of people ought they to be who plead the cause of Christian union?" The answer to this question is the point of supreme value in the sermon, and there is no people to whom it has so direct an application as to the Disciples of Christ, because no other people have made Christian unity the very reason of their existence. We shall be glad to furnish it to our ministers or others at the publishers' price.

Editor's Easy Chair.

To-night marks the close of our "Easy Chair" musings for the year 1907. It is the time when, in imagination, we light our annual camp-fire and gather about it our Easy Chair family. They come from many states and from many lands. What a great company we have grown to be! And how strong is the bond that binds together those who have really caught the Easy Chair point of view and feel the tie of spiritual friendship! Some familiar faces that were with us a year ago are absent to-night. They have heard the summons calling them above and have gone up to join a higher and holier fellowship. Of those who are gathered with us in this annual council to-night, it is certain that many will be absent at the roll call a year hence. This is not said to sadden us, but to sober us, that we may so number our days as to get us a heart of wisdom. Think you that those of our number who have gone on before and whose eyes have opened on the "land that is fairer than day," would return hither to these scenes of mortal life if they could? If any motive could induce them to return it would be that they might arouse us to a truer realization of the value of this present life in its relation to that life which lies beyond the veil. They now see and know, as we mortals cannot, how full this world is of God, and how heaven has its beginning here in the thoughts we cherish, in the aims we choose, in the lives we live. If we could only realize this truth, life would henceforth be very different with all of us.

Beloved, this is the fifty-second time that the Easy Chair has visited you during this present year of our Lord, without missing a single week. These messages, if compiled, would alone make a volume of perhaps two hundred pages. And yet that is only about one-third of the matter that has been printed on these pages during the year from the same pen. Do you wonder if sometimes we feel a sense of weariness, and sigh for the land of rest? And yet, this is only an occasional mood when the burden seems unusually heavy. Ordinarily we do not think of these tasks as work, but as an opportunity for service to our fellow-men which we are glad to use. It is the joy that comes from the consciousness of serving God and our fellow-men that enables us all to bear cheerfully the burden of our daily tasks. And yet it is not the quantity of one's work that tells so much as its quality. "For every man's work shall be tried, of what sort it is." The fire which tries it will destroy all the perishable material, but will only purify and brighten the precious metal. There is one question we may all well ask ourselves to-night, as we sit by the embers of the dying year: "What work have I wrought during the year past that is likely to endure?" Not necessarily in history, as a recorded part of the world's life and progress, for that honor falls to but few, relatively, of all who live and labor for the world's betterment; but how much of what we have done has met with God's approval, and will be an abiding influence for good in the world? That question is one that goes to the heart of all our efforts, and uncovers the motives which influence our actions.

There is no healthier practice that any of us can indulge in than that of subjecting the motives of our lives to the scrutinizing eye of God. When we stop to think of it we know, of course, that all the motives of our lives are known to him, but it is one thing to know a truth in the abstract, and quite another to realize it, and make a practical application of it to our lives. Many of us who are carried along in the swirl of business and social life, thinking as the world thinks and living as the world lives, would be appalled if we could only become quiet and thoughtful long enough to bring out our secret motives and purposes, to be tried at the bar of our own consciences, and tested by the will of God, as that will is known to us. What is the ruling motive of your life and mine? Is it love to God and fellow-man? We cannot doubt but that this was the motive of God in creation, and in redemption. No word or deed of ours will ever prove immortal, except those born of love. Everything else is "wood and hay and stubble" before the consuming fire of God. It is love that allies us with God and makes us share in his immortality. "He that abideth in love abideth in God. For God is love." As we are looking backward to-night over the year's work, we may well apply this test to all our acts, for this is the test which God applies and will apply to all our work. The broken alabaster box of ointment which anointed the Saviour's head has filled all the centuries with its fragrance, because it was an act of love. Nothing can be more trite, nor more true, than that our lives are made up of little acts, in the main, and not of great deeds, and if these daily, unrecorded acts of our lives be prompted by kindness of heart, by love to God and to our fellow-men, they will yield us the largest amount of true happiness here, and are certain of their reward in heaven.

What a variety of experiences come into the average life during the circuit of our planet around the sun! Our hearts have been filled at one time with joy, at another with sorrow; at one time with hope, at another with fear; at one time with peace, at another with anxiety. We have had health and we have had sickness. We have enjoyed the fellowship of friends, and we have felt the criticism or opposition of foes. We have been alone in the solitude of nature, and have been jostled in the crowded thoroughfare. We have passed through the changing seasons of springtime, summer, autumn and winter. We have had periods of prosperity, and of adversity. Sometimes we have stood on the mountain-top, above the clouds, and through the lens of faith have seen all the heavens glowing with signs of promise and of coming victory. At other times we have walked in the valley of shadows, and the clouds for the time-being have seemed to shut out the very face of the shining sun. And yet even then Faith lighted her torch for us, Hope sang her sweet song, and Love poured her oil of consolation into our wounded hearts. We can now see that God was with us in the valley, no less than on the mountain-top, and that in all these diverse and varied experiences God was seeking to teach us his will, and mould us into what he would have us to be. And so let us thank him before the old year expires for all that it has brought to us, whether of joy or sorrow, of prosperity or adversity, of victory or defeat, believing that "all things work together for good to them that love God, and are called according to his purpose."

We can not close this last "Easy Chair" talk for the year without expressing our gratitude for the numerous expressions of appreciation of this department of the paper. Leaving it to others to discover, if they can, any rational justification for the warm place the 'Easy Chair" seems to hold in the hearts of our readers, we are content to thank them for ther unstinted words of praise. Throughout the year, and through many years these kind words have been strength and inspiration to us when we needed the very encouragement they have given us. It is probably because we feel at liberty in this department to leave off some of the dignity that doth hedge about an editor in his editorial leaders, and talk in heart-to-heart fashion with our readers, that the "Easy Chair" appeals to so many hearts. But whatever may be the cause, we are grateful for the response it brings, because in that fact we know that we are in some measure accomplishing the end we have in view. To scatter sunshine and good will among men; to keep to the front the beauty and joy and worth of living; to carry light to shadowed lives, and comfort to those who wear the garments of mourning; to point out the good, rather than the evil there is in men; to see and help others to see how God lives in the world he has created, and how the earth is filled with his goodness and mercy; to foster mutual love and forbearance, and strengthen the tie that binds us all together as members of a common family; in a word—to stress the true, the beautiful and the good—these are some of the principal ends which the "Easy Chair" keeps in view. That these things appeal to our readers is more complimentary to them than to the hand that imperfectly presents them. . . Hoping to greet you all on the threshold of the New Year, we make our bow to the Old Year, as it slips away from us into the gulf of eternity and trust that its experiences, even its mistakes, may help us to more wisely perform the duties of the future.

As Seen From the Dome By F. D. Power

To the work of the church there may be given a threefold classification—a work of teaching, of ingathering, and of training. The first duty of the apostolic church was to teach. "Go teach all nations." "The gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." "How can they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how can they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how can they hear without a preacher?" "When in the wisdom of God, the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believed."

First of all on Pentecost Peter stood in Jerusalem and cried: "Ye men of Israel, hear!" Thus were the Jews moved to accept Christ. And Cornelius, the first Gentile convert, was commanded to send for Peter, who should tell him "words whereby he should be saved." The early Christians "daily in the temple, and from house to house, ceased not to teach and to preach Jesus Christ" and "they that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word." Prophets, apostles, John the Baptist, our Lord, and all disciples were teachers. The call was, "Incline thine ear and come unto me: hear and thy soul shall live." "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." "No man cometh unto me except the father that hath sent me draw him. It is written in the prophets, they shall be all taught of God. Everyone therefore that hath heard and learned of the father cometh unto me."

The word of truth, given by inspiration, is ours to-day in the Bible. Here we have Moses speaking—homely, simple, quaint, ancient, legal; Isaiah, brilliant, breathing, burning; Ezekiel, oracular; Solomon, sapient, far-seeing; David, personal, human, songful; Job, dramatic; Jeremiah, tearful; Peter, bold, blunt, aggressive; John, tender, yet majestic; Paul, logical, forensic, sublime—all these, moved by the Holy Spirit to declare the truth of God, yet glow and shine, and move and illumine all ages and all spirits. And in the same old way, as the Master said: "The kingdom of heaven is like a sower," and the word is the seed sown. Some seed falls on the roadway, hard and unyielding, and some on stony ground, and some among thorns, and men are born again not of corruptible seed, but incorruptible, the word of God that liveth and abideth forever, and men bring forth fruit, thirty, sixty and a hundred fold, and have their fruit unto holiness and in the end eternal life.

And this work of teaching is to be done by all the church, not the preacher alone, nor the old and experienced, nor the skilful and educated, but the whole church, pulpit and pew alike, babes in Christ and strong men. The gospel must be preached, and we are the people chosen of God and called of God and commanded by God, in word and deed and power, in church and school, in home and shop and street to preach it to the world. Nor is it in a limited circle the gospel is to be proclaimed, a certain number of a certain street—our community, our city, our state, our country—but far and wide the church must lengthen her cords and strengthen her stakes. Christianity is missionary, world-embracing from first to last. It had its origin in a mission; it will have its millennial triumph through a mission. The only begotten of God—the Sent One—was its first and ever-living missionary. The breadth of its mission is the breadth of humanity. From the apex of glory, the glory that was with the Father before the world was, down the long stairway of the incarnation; yes, down below all necessity and need and sorrow and suffering and sin, beneath the undermost and most abject of sin's victims, is the measureless depth to which it descends to seek and to save, and then up it lifts, up the immeasurable ascent from the abyss of sin and death to eternal glory. The spirit of missions is the spirit of the Master. Christianity is diffusive, the salt of the earth. The teacher must go everywhere. The light must shine, the gospel be proclaimed, the hand of the church be felt until Christ reigns in all lands and in all hearts.

Secondly, the Word given, and facilities for its delivery to the world, next comes the work of ingathering. From the East and West and North and South a great multitude which no man can number, of every kindred and tribe and tongue and people, and they must be gathered in here. Three thousand were the fruit of the first gospel sermon ever preached, five thousand the next; and so the word of the Lord increased and the number of disciples multiplied greatly. Our work also is to gather in the people. We must bring them into our churches to hear the word, into our Sunday-schools, our Young People's organizations and our prayer and mission meetings. We must not fold our hands in idle, selfish contentment and rest satisfied that we, ourselves, are safely sheltered in the fold of Christ. We must labor to bring men, women and children in our home our families, our society, our business circles, and the stranger within our gates to the church and to Christ. We must not talk of the gospel being free and sit in our seats and coddle ourselves, and think, if people do not choose to come, let them stay away, consider our duty discharged when we have provided the sanctuary and ordinances and preaching of the word; or stay away ourselves from the Lord's house, and have to be invited, urged, persuaded, honeyed, sugared and coaxed and looked after continually. No church is fulfilling its purpose that is not gathering in a harvest of souls. Ingathering work is of two kinds: bringing the people to hear, for faith cometh by hearing, and bringing them to decision for Christ and to membership in the household of faith. We want to catch men. We would be fishers of men. We would make our churches veritable soul-traps. We would open in every place the Church of Christ, throw wide its doors, and with royal welcome for all, the poorest and lowliest, all that would enter and sit at the feet of Christ.

How the world is gathering them in! What instruments it uses to allure the multitude into its ways! What pitfalls along every path—the low theatre, gaming table, dance-hall, saloon, the schemes to enrich, as hunters dig pits in the earth and cover them over and place bait near to attract their prey, that they may venture on the treacherous places and fall in utter ruin! How often we see that favorite fiction of childhood—the story of Sinbad the Sailor and the magnetic rock—illustrated in the destruction of human barques upon the sea of life, through the subtile magnetic attraction of worldliness! It is the work of the church to overcome the world, to gather men into the kingdom of heaven, to go into the highways and hedges and compel them to come in, to make the kingdoms of the world our Lord's Kingdom.

A third work is that of training. Not enough is it to gather the children into the schools; the real and serious work begins in the slow and arduous processes of education. Copy books are to be blotted, and slates written over and over again, and text books pored over till lines are worn and well-nigh illegible, and the path to the schoolhouse and road to the college must be trod ten thousand times before the boy can claim his Master's degree: and the boy that stumbles and blots his copy and spells badly, and locates Patagonia in Europe and Cape Town in the United States, and does not know a noun from a verb or a decimal from an integer is not, therefore, to be thrown out and condemned as incapable. He is the very boy that needs the school, the attention of the teacher, the encouragement of his fellow-pupils, training, education, growth.

God means to train his people. All the experiences of life, even sin and suffering, are parts of this discipline. Disciples we are, learners in the school of Christ, babes at first, that must be fed and nourished and cared for, as a mother cares for her little ones. "Grow in grace", "Give diligence to make your calling and election sure." "Christ also suffered, leaving an example, that we should follow in his steps." "Giving all diligence add to your faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, love." "Be patient therefore." Teaching is not enough. Proclamation of the gospel in all the world is not sufficient. Churches must be organized, ordinances observed, souls trained. Teaching communicates ideas; training forms habits. Teaching imparts knowledge; training develops power. Teaching explains words; training shows methods—how. Imagine a boy learning to write from theory, or a girl to play the violin, or an apprentice to build a house. "Why, my dear, do you tell that dull boy the same thing twenty times over?" said John Wesley's father to his wife. "Because nineteen times won't do. If I tell him nineteen times all my labor is lost, but the twentieth secures the object." How often people are gathered into the church and left to drift, and their talents unimproved! How often seemingly dull and unprofitable Christians could be made glorious workers for Christ and humanity by education, training in divine things!

Michael Angelo sees the block of marble in an obscure street of Florence, neglected and half-covered with dirt and rubbish. Regardless of his holiday dress he falls to work on it, clears away the filth, and lifts it from the slime and mire in which it lay. "What are you going to do with that worthless piece of rock?" they ask him. "O, there is an angel in the stone and I must let it out!" To the educated eye in the rude and unsightly mass of stone is a buried glory of art. The mason would put it in the stone wall; the cartman use it for filling in the street; but the artist goes to work with patient toil, and with mallet chisel lets the angel out, transforms it into a creation of genius, and gives it a value for ages to come.

Here is a bar of iron worth five dollars. Worked into horse-shoes it is worth ten dollars and a half; made into needles, two hundred and eighty-five dollars; fashioned into balance springs for watches, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. What a drilling it must go through before it is worth all that! but hammered and beaten and rolled and polished, how its value is increased! So drilling and training and the discipline of Christian life serve to bring out the finer qualities and fit us to be Christians indeed.

Abundant means are provided for this training. While one book of the Bible, the Acts of Apostles, tells men what to do to be saved, twenty-one epistles are written for our government, guidance and growth in knowledge, faith and fruitfulness. There is the preaching of the word for the edification of believers. There are the ordinances. No greater power to keep men near to Christ and endue them with something of the sympathy and might of the Cross than the weekly observance of the Lord's Supper. Then the Sunday-school is not without sovereign virtue. It is no longer a ragged school or common school, but a Bible school; and into it are gathered not boys and girls only, but young men and women, and old people as well. Then there are the prayer-meetings, and young peoples' meetings, and public offerings and social meetings.

Men sometimes think they can be Christians without this training. The boy asked his father why he did not go to Sunday-school and prayer-meeting, and the Sunday night services of the church. "O, I'm 'stablished: no need of my going," said the father. A few days after, out with the old horse and cart, hauling wood, they came to a hill and the horse wouldn't pull; with all their efforts they could not induce it to pull. "What do you think is the matter?" asked the man of the boy. "O, he's 'stablished, father! He don't need to pull."

What difference is there between such a professed Christian and one who makes no profession? "I wish you had decided to-night for Christ," said a woman to her husband, after listening to an earnest evangelist. "Would it have made any difference in me?" "It would have put you on the side of right." "But am I not on the side of right?" said the man. "What do I do that you do not do? You are a professed Christian and I am not. Let us see. I do not use tobacco in any form. You do not. I do not use profane language: neither do you. I am a teetotaler: so are you. I go to the theater: you go to the theater. I play cards: you play cards. I attend church irregularly: you do the same. I pay little to the cause of religion: so do you. I dance: you dance. I read trashy novels: you do the same. I do not attend prayer-meetings, nor do you. I do not read my Bible: do you? I do not pray: do you pray? Now what does your church membership add to your manner of living? Where do your ways differ from mine?" The young woman began laughing and ended in tears. "I did not intend to pain you", said the husband, "I am sorry." "I am not sorry. I thank you. I see how inconsistent I am," was the wife's reply. From that hour she began a new

Reflections Upon the Preacher and His Life

By Joseph Lowe

Being a constant and careful reader of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, there is but little that appears in its columns that I do not read. In a recent issue I read with pleasure and care the article of Champ Clark, entitled "Preachers Underpaid." I have no criticism to offer upon it for the reason, first, it is all true; and, second, I do not like the word criticism. But the article unlocked the mystic door of memory. At a very early age, like many other boys, I was thrown out to care for myself and others, and also to select my own avocation for life. Through the usual trials of a homeless boy I prepared myself to enter the commercial world, and at 19 was receiving $400 per year, with a promise of $800 soon. A responsible party connected with a wholesale firm in St. Louis assured me a salary of $1,500 if I would work for them. I had decided at that time to give up the world and prepare myself to preach the gospel. Two elders in a large church where my membership was came to the store where I was clerking and tried with all the persuasion possible to have me give up the thought of preaching, and give my life to commercial interests. This act of the elders I loved so well staggered my faith for a season. But I began preparation for preaching the gospel and in two or three years I married and commenced preaching at a salary of $300 per year. Can any of your readers tell me why I did this? I had had no "call" by vision or angel. I believe the heart-motive decides the young man whether he will preach or practice law. Among the many valuable things said by W. T. Moore that will go down into history was what he declared at a convention in Cincinnati, namely, that he would not have his son preach the gospel if the son could help it; but if his love for Christ and perishing humanity was so strong that he could not help but preach, then God had "called" him to preach. Other things being equal, can any true believer in Christ fail to believe that Christ would not support such a man—through human agencies it may be? It is certainly a very dangerous thing for a preacher who is capable of preaching the gospel to leave the pulpit for an earthly calling. Christ ever taught that his ministers would have hardships in almost every way. Paul said: "Woe be to me if I preach not the gospel." Paul said to Timothy: "Endure hardness as a good soldier of Christ." "And they (the apostles) departed, rejoicing that they were worthy to suffer for Christ." "O ye of little faith," said Christ. I have tried to quit preaching twice and engage in business, only to be followed by disaster and injury to the church, and just as soon as I left all for Christ prosperity came to me. I can sincerely say "that the life I now live is by faith in Christ Jesus my Lord." He gives me as many cheerful, happy, bright days in the accumulation of age as I enjoyed in early manhood. I am always employed and love all my brethren.

LITERATURE OF TO-DAY

"LOOK ALIVE!" Stories of Some Wide-Awake Young People, by Amos R. Wells. American Tract Society, 150 Nassau street, New York City. Price 75 cents.

Among the most popular writers for young people of to-day is Mr. Amos R. Wells, editor of the "Christian Endeavor World," author of "That They All May Be One"; "Two Minute Talks," etc. This volume is made up of a series of stories, some of which have appeared in various publications before, but a portion of them appearing now for the first time in print. They all have a moral, but the moral is so hid away in the interest of the story that one takes it in imperceptibly. Young people will devour it greedily and will be the better for so doing, and wiser also. A few of the chapter titles will be suggestive: "The Purple Beech"; "Riding the Elevator Bareback"; "Those Thieving Sidenstickses"; "The War of the Clothes-lines"; "Making a Place for Herself"; "The Coasting on Clapper's Hill"; "Rum and Molasses"; "A 'Wild-west' Messenger Boy," etc. It is illustrated, and makes an excellent holiday book.

"THE DEACONESS MOTHERHOUSE IN ITS RELATION TO THE DEACONESS WORK," by Rev. Christian Golder, Ph. D. Pittsburg Printing Company, Seventh avenue, Pittsburg, Pa.

The object of this work by Dr. Golder is, first, to point out the Scriptural basis of the Female Diaconate, and to give a comprehensive view of the "Deaconess Motherhouse," as it has developed in the course of seven decades, especially in Germany, and also to give a representation of the development and history of the deaconess work in the United States. The Methodist Episcopal church has been wise, we believe, in the restoration of this ancient order of servants in the church, and is deriving a great benefit from it. We believe other churches might do so with great profit. Those who are interested in this subject will find much desired information in this little volume.

"PREACHER AND PRAYER," by E. M. Pounds, Washington, Ga. Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, Nashville, Tenn.; Dallas, Texas, 1907.

It may be doubted whether the vital relation of prayer to effective preaching is realized by the average minister of the gospel. This little volume emphasizes the place of prayer in a minister's life in such a way that no one can read it without feeling that here is a source of spiritual power which he has neglected. The author is full of his theme and he quotes from the great preachers and writers of the past, fortifying the position which he assigns to prayer. We commend the little volume most heartily to every preacher of the gospel who feels that his preaching is not sufficiently vital nor fruitful in its results. We should be glad to know that hundreds of our ministers had secured this volume and had drawn from it fresh inspiration to put more prayer into their ministry.

"TAKING MEN ALIVE"—A Study in Principles and Practice of Individual Soul-winning, by Charles Gallaudet Trumbull. New York Young Men's Christian Association Press, 1907. Price, cloth, 60 cents; paper, 40 cents.

The author of this work is the son of the late Henry Clay Trumbull, to whom the book is dedicated. He has made a special study of "Individual Work for Individuals," based on the experiences recorded in his father's volume on that subject. The result of the son's investigation of this theme has resulted in this volume. Much emphasis is being given just now to individual soul-winning, and this volume furnishes both inspiration and direction for this important work. Henry Ward Beecher is quoted as saying: "The longer I live, the more confidence I have in those sermons preached where one man is the minister and one man is the congregation." That, we believe, would be the testimony of many ministers. But that is the kind of preaching, which, after all, every Christian ought to be able to do. Ministers desiring to train their people in personal work, and form classes for that purpose, will find this a valuable text-book.

Any book reviewed in these columns (except "net" books) will be sent postpaid by The Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis, on receipt of the published price. For "net" books, add ten per cent for postage.

AMERICA'S AWAKENING. By Philip Loring Allen. Price $1.25 net. Fleming H. Revell.

A thoroughly inspirational book and a striking interpretation of the moral wave as touching the average man in politics and business. It is concerned with the triumph of righteousness in high places. The writer knows his subject and he makes the world know it. He has the knack of the trained journalist to put on the canvas the salient points and his story of struggle and achievement fills the reader with an optimism that would send him forth to fight the good fight.

FAMOUS HYMNS AND TUNES. By Allen Sutherland. Price $1.20 net. Frederick A. Stokes.

This volume in substance appeared first in a popular magazine. It tells graphically and charmingly about the origin and romance of many hymns and gives information, much of it in fullness of detail, that is not to be found elsewhere. The author has not attempted any exhaustive work on hymnology, but above everything has demonstrated the need and the value of great songs. Dr. McCook writes an introduction and we notice that G. P. Rutledge, of Philadelphia, contributes an interesting incident out of his experience.

BIBLE TRUTHS THROUGH EYE AND EAR. By George V. Reichel. Price $1 net. Thomas Whittaker.

This book of short talks by the author of "What Shall I Tell the Children," follows the same general plan of that volume, but introduces many subjects of latest interest and importance. The idea is to suggest religious truth by the use of objects. Much information of various kinds is imparted and the arrow hits the mark.

FAVORITE FAIRY TALES. Illustrated by Peter Newell. Price, $3 net. Harper and Brothers.

This is one of the choice gift books for young people of the season. It is sumptuous from the printer's standpoint, and a delight to the eye and the touch. It has a cream and gold binding, and has a protective cover of green which harmonizes with the color work of the pages. The fairy tales are printed from black ink in large clear type. The illustrations are characteristic of the artist and these will prove a delight to old folks as well as young. The fairy tales are the more popular ones and have been chosen upon an original plan. The desire of the publishers has been to determine the youthful preferences of men and women of to-day whose opinions carry weight, and to present their selections among the wealth of fairy tales which the world cherishes from one generation to another. Of course, more than one vote has been cast for the same story. It is really interesting merely to note the preferences of certain prominent men. Ex-President Cleveland does not feel that he ought to venture an opinion, but found that his children preferred Cinderella. Mr. Bryan declares that his wife assures him that he would make no mistake if he commended the tales of Hans Christian Andersen, notably that of the Ugly Duckling. But there are other men and women who speak for themselves. The only objection we can see to this beautiful book is that it is almost too handsome to put into the hands of children.

TUXEDO AVENUE TO WATER STREET. By Amos R. Wells. Price $1. Funk and Wagnalls.

This proved popular as a serial story and has been instrumental in revivals. It is a parable. As the author says, it shows a church "transferred to the highways and hedges, a church going forth as all churches will some day go forth to the place where the need is, where the work and the blessedness are." Here is the inspiration that is needed.

THE CHRISTIAN AND AMUSEMENTS. By William Edward Biederwolf. The Winona Publishing Company, Chicago. Price 25 cents.

This little booklet discusses and answers three questions:

Is dancing sinful?
Is card-playing wrong?
Is theater-going harmful?

If any one is disposed to laugh at such questions as out of date, he would do well to send for a copy of this book and read it carefully. It is not an ignorant tirade against innocent amusements, but a thoughtful appeal to the consciences of Christians concerning practices that involve the most serious consequences, and citing expert testimony from those who know the facts. We commend this little booklet to the attention of Christian people.

NEW CHRONICLES OF REBECCA. By Kate Douglas Wiggin. Price $1.25. Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

The frontispiece makes you want to know all about this little maid. And is there one more charming? A delightful creation she is, and she is associated with many interesting characters. This is one of the choice books for young folk.

THE OLD YEAR AND THE NEW. By Charles Edward Jefferson. Price, 75 cents to $1.50; according to binding. Thomas Y. Crowell.

This is a New Year's address based upon the words of Paul, "Forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before." So that the sub-title, "The Art of Forgetting," more clearly describes the contents than does the title. As the author points out, few people wish to learn how to forget; instead, they desire more and more to remember. Yet there comes a time in every life when the blotting out of useless and dark memories would be a blessing. It is here where Dr. Jefferson renders help. He is trenchant in style and keen in his analysis. It is a good book to begin the year with.

—"I am selfish enough to feel that I would like to see her spend a year in Illinois among our Bible Schools." Thus writes H. H. Peters of Miss Eva Lemert, who has recently closed an interesting campaign for his church at Dixon. DePew, the newly-elected Bible School Superintendent, has induced her to devote herself to Illinois and appointments may be made for her through him.

—I. J. Spencer, of Lexington, Ky., has found it necessary to resign as one of the vice presidents of the Foreign Society. At the regular meeting of the executive committee on December 13 his resignation was accepted with regret. A multiplicity of duties seem to him to make his resignation necessary. He was a valuable member of the committee. Ralph O. Newcomb, of Evanston, Ohio, was elected to fill the va-

Again we call our subscribers' attention to the following new ruling from the Post Office Department at Washington, as it effects all who are in arrears one year or more.

Washington, December 9.—Postmaster General Meyer to-day promulgated his new regulations relative to the second-class mailing privilege, which will become effective on January 1.

The section of the regulations which fixes the time a publication may be sent to a person without a renewal of subscription follows:

"A reasonable time will be allowed publishers to secure renewals of subscriptions, but unless subscriptions are expressly renewed after the term for which they are paid, within the following periods—

"Dailies, within three months; triweeklies, within six months; semiweeklies, within nine months; weeklies, within one year; semimonthlies, within three months; monthlies, within four months; bimonthlies, within six months—

"They shall not be counted in the legitimate list of subscribers, and copies mailed on account thereof shall not be accepted for mailing at the second-class postage rate of 1 cent a pound, but may be mailed at the transient second-class postage rate of 1 cent for each four ounces or fraction thereof, prepaid by stamps affixed. The right of a publisher to extend credit for subscriptions to his publication is not denied or questioned, but his compliance or noncompliance with this regulation will be taken into consideration in determining whether the publication is entitled to transmission at the second-class postage rates."

We are especially desirous that none of our many subscribers be without a single copy of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST the coming year, but the United States Government will compel us to discontinue mailing copies, at the pound rate, to those in arrears one year and over, therefore we again urge our subscribers to look at the little yellow label on front cover page, and if delinquent, pay up before the first of the new year.

cancy. Mr. Newcomb is a rising young business man, a graduate of Hiram College and an active member of the Evanston church, and will no doubt make a valuable member.

—We are glad to know of a new "team" in the evangelistic work. W. H. Pinkerton, of Paducah, Ky., is to be allied with J. Herman Dodd, of Columbus, Ohio. Both have had much experience and success in the field. It is a departure from the old plan in having two evangelists on the platform at the same time, but with the work of each properly adjusted there will be combined all the elements of a successful gospel service. Dates for future meetings are now being arranged, and we cordially commend to the attention of our readers this combination of high-class evangelists. Communications should be sent to J. H. Dodd, 501 Linwood Ave., Columbus, Ohio.

—A new church at Clarksburg, W. Va., is nearing completion and will cost about $25,000. The congregation was organized in December, 1905, with nineteen members, the meeting being held by W. M. Long, the present minister, assisted by A. Linkletter, state evangelist. During the past year there have been twenty-three baptisms at the regular services. A meeting is to be held by home forces in February or March, when the auditorium is entered. E. E. Violett is scheduled to lead it. The present membership is eighty, and the Bible school, under the efficient leadership of W. P. Martin, has reached an average attendance of fifty-five, with eighty enrolled. The Ladies' Aid has been a great help, having raised about $1,500 in the past two years.

—G. H. Bradford is delighted with the meeting which he is holding at Van Alstyne, Texas, and the helpful assistance of L. D. Sprague, who has charge of the music. The seating capacity of the church is not great enough to accommodate the people who would attend. The local paper says that Brother Bradford has demonstrated his ability to interest the public, and incidentally that the gospel has not lost its power unto salvation. Favorable comment is being made by all the denominations concerning both the sermons and the singing. Brother Bradford says: "The purpose was a church rally, not a revival meeting." Brother Sprague, whom he commends highly, is to remain ten days after the meeting closes to conduct a song revival.

—W. E. Pierce has been at Cameron, W. Va., since his graduation from Bethany five years ago. Orillas G. White, editor of the "West Virginia Christian," who has just been paying a visit to that place, says Brother Pierce's ministry is ideal. He is the leader in keeping the town clean, is president of the federated churches, while at the same time he has made his own church the strongest. The M. E. minister uses him in his revival and has Brother Pierce immerse some of his converts. There are few better churches than that at Cameron. This congregation will soon have their own missionary in the foreign field. In connection with other churches they now support Mrs. W. H. Erskine, of Akita, Japan, and their Bible school is as large as all the other schools in the town combined.

—The sixth anniversary of E. L. Day in the pastorate at Brazil, Ind., has been observed. It is the longest continuous pastorate in the history of this church. A beautiful harmony prevails. There have been nearly five hundred additions during this period, and the present enrollment is more than six hundred and fifty. The Bible school is splendidly organized and equipped, and doing the best work in its history, with an attendance of about 275, while it shows a much greater missionary spirit in the matter of giving than the M. E. school, which is three times as large. Brother Day has over six thousand calls registered on his list, so that he has been shepherding his flock. The congregation is poor and has had to struggle, but for all purposes about thirty thousand dollars have been raised. The debt entailed by the fire and rebuilding is being gradually removed. The congregation will hold a meeting in February with home forces. With much of the past spent in accomplishing material things, the emphasis is now being especially laid upon spiritual victories. Brother Day and his church may be congratulated for what they have done, and for the outlook before them.

—H. H. Peters has surprised the official board of the church at Dixon, Ill., by asking to be released from the pastorate, February 1, 1908. He is going into the field in the interest of Eureka College. As is already known, an effort has been started to secure eighty people who will give $25 a year each for five years toward putting a man in the field for raising a $200,000 endowment. Sixty-seven promises have been made, we believe, and Mr. Peters has been selected to do this special work. He is a graduate of Eureka and an intimate friend of President Hieronymus. He has been in the Christian ministry for more than fourteen years, and had charge of the church at Dixon for the past eighteen months, during which time the church has shown advance, over fifty additions being reported. The regular services are better attended and the Bible school is greatly enlarged. The indebtedness on the building for current expenses has been reduced one-half, and the church put upon a new financial basis. We bespeak for Brother Peters and the cause he is to serve a hearty welcome, and trust that the congregation he is to leave will soon find a worthy successor to him.

To the Brotherhood of Missouri and Elsewhere.

President Carl Johann, of Christian University, Canton, Mo., and Dean W. J. Lhamon, of the Bible College of Missouri, Columbia, Mo., take pleasure in announcing that the institutions which they respectively represent have planned and are planning hereafter to work in harmony and not at all in rivalry. Each institution has its distinctive field, and each field is greatly in need of a strong, vigorous and aggressive work. The Bible college management is frank and earnest in the belief that Christian University has done for the brotherhood and the cause of Christ a great service relatively to the amount the brotherhood has invested in the institution. And it is just as earnest in the belief that greater investments will bring greater returns. It is greatly desirable that that institution be put on a stronger financial basis. This is the announced conviction of the Bible college management, some of whose donors are donors to Christian University.

On the other hand the management of Christian University is just as frank in the recognition of the important field and vigorous and promising work that the Bible College, yet in its youth, is doing. It deserves the full confidence and needs the support of the brotherhood. The faculties of the two institutions, each respectfully, recognizes and gives credit for the work done in the other.

We believe that the rivalries of the past have been more in seeming than in fact, and certainly not greater on the part of the respective managements than on the part of the respective friends of the two institutions. We invite these friends henceforth to be our mutual friends, and to them and to the brotherhood the two institutions henceforth shall appeal and it shall be the object of each to build up with the help of the brotherhood a great and scholarly and conservative and spiritually powerful Bible work. We assure the brotherhood that we have no other aim than to glorify the Redeemer, and to further his kingdom by the proper teaching of God's holy word.

President Christian University.

Plans Formed for the Hot Springs Work.

After considerable delay we are able to announce to the brotherhod the plans for building the new church. The Board of Church Extension has agreed to a loan of $7,500. With this help in sight the work at Hot Springs becomes an easy proposition, for it leaves us but a balance of $7,500 to make the new church building an actual fact. The efforts of our committee have been crowned with success in securing John L. Andrews as field secretary to raise this money. Under the direction of the American Christian Missionary Society, the Christian Woman's Board of Missions and the Texas State Board, he was sent to Mineral Wells, Texas, a few years ago and did what many said could not be done in a health resort. For several years he has been manager of one of the largest window factories in the West, during which time he has made a close study of church building and money-raising. Brother Andrews has the confidence of all the Texas brethren, is a recognized preacher of good ability, and a good business man, and those to whom he comes in the name of the Hot Springs work, may receive him with absolute confidence. We found it to be the last resort to send a man into the field, and we hope the brethren will respond to Brother Andrews' appeal readily and make short work of raising the rest of the money needed to complete the Hot Springs work.

There are thousands whom Brother Andrews can not reach who ought to aid this work, and since it has been put in such a shape that success is absolutely certain, we appeal to brethren to no longer delay withholding sympathy and co-operation. Let every one rally at once and send us what aid he can.

The Arkansas National Bank of Hot Springs will receive and hold the money until the church of Hot Springs has raised the $5,000 allotted to it, and expended it on the building, then the $7,500 which Brother Andrews is to raise will be used; then we will draw upon the Board of Church Extension to complete the work.

T. N. Kincaid.

[We have given much space to the furtherance of this enterprise at Hot Springs, and rejoice that success now seems to be in sight. We hope the work of Brother Andrews will be crowned with success.—EDITOR.]

Woman's Work at Taylorville, Ill.

Mrs. Laura Meredith, president of the local organization, presided at the C. W. B. M. day observance at the Taylorville church. The address was delivered by Miss Anna Barbre, one of our enthusiastic workers, and also the efficient county superintendent of our schools. She has been engaged to deliver this address at a number of other places. The local society is planning for even more aggressive work the coming year.

Twenty-five Years of Successful Work.

T. W. Grafton, pastor of the Central Christian Church, Anderson, Ind., has celebrated his silver anniversary in the work of the ministry of the gospel. Twenty-five big silver dollars, the brightest that could be obtained, were presented to him by the congregation on this occasion.

Brother Grafton began his ministerial career at Sterling, Ill., in October, 1882. From Iowa farm life he entered college, his final work being at Butler, Indianapolis. After five years at Sterling he ministered to the church at Rock Island for ten years, going thence to Ann Arbor, where he spent three years, and for the last four and one-half years he has been at Anderson. For some time he was in St. Louis and associated with THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. When he went to Anderson the church had a membership of 900, which has now grown to 1,900. He found a Sunday-school with an enrollment of 500; it now exceeds 1,300. A debt of $17,000 hung over the congregation when he took charge, and this has been reduced to $6,000, and will probably be wiped out entirely before another twelve months have passed.

Reviewing his ministry in his anniversary sermon Brother Grafton declared that the gospel scheme of redemption has grown on him during the past twenty-five years. He believes now more than he ever did before that if men are saved it must be through the power of the gospel.

He believes he has a sympathetic congregation in Anderson. The church there has paid him every dollar of his salary, has done everything it ever agreed to do for him and has as a general proposition stood by him in everything he has undertaken to do in the line of his ministerial work. "But if every member of the church would rally to its support," he declared, "Central Christian Church alone, with its 2,000 people, could revolutionize the city of Anderson for good."

Organizing the Men.

On September 30, 1907, Hon Thomas W. Phillips, of New Castle, Pa., sent to all the ministers of the Christian Church, a circular making certain suggestions in regard to "unifying our forces in order to do more methodical and efficient work."

With respect to missions he mentioned two things which are essential: information and organization. He stated the well-known fact that the largest number of our men are practically uninformed upon mission work.

He said, "They need information to inspire more universal giving and support. To accomplish this, I suggest organizing the men of each congregation into missionary societies, with an annual membership fee to be paid quarterly. These societies to meet quarterly, for the purpose of studying and discussing missionary work in its broadest sense, American and foreign. Once during the year these missionary societies to hold a joint meeting with the C. W. B. M. auxiliaries of each congregation, thus promoting harmony and interest in and knowledge of our missionary work along all lines. It would be impracticable now to organize two missionary societies, home and foreign in each congregation."

This suggestion seemed to me to be so wise and practicable and needful that I brought it before our board of officers who gave it unanimous and enthusiastic approval. The following Sunday evening at the close of the services we asked all to remain and massed the men in the middle section of the church, while the ladies occupied the seats on the right and left. The pastor made a brief statement of the object of the meeting. Brother Phillips was made temporary chairman and in a few well-chosen words gave his idea of the importance of the proposed movement if it were adopted by the churches. A constitution was read and fifty-two men became members of the "Men's Missionary Society," and all this was accomplished in considerably less than half an hour. No one was tired and every one was interested and enthusiastic. The next Sunday evening a second meeting was called and other names were added.

The constitution provides for four regular meetings each year, one each quarter. The theme of the first meeting will be our local field and its missionary needs. At the second meeting will be discussed state missions; at the third, American missions, including church extension; and at the fourth, the foreign field.

One special meeting will be held each year in the interest of the work of the National Benevolent Society and Ministerial Relief. A second special meeting has been provided for, at which time the Men's Missionary Society will accept the invitation already given by the C. W. B. M. to meet with them in joint session when refreshments may be served and after-dinner speeches will not be prohibited. It is the duty of the executive committee to arrange programs for all of these meetings and provide papers or addresses to be delivered by members of the society or invited guests.

The membership fee has been fixed at 50 cents per quarter, or $2 a year, which is only 5 cents more per quarter than is paid by the members of the C. W. B. M. We believe that this small fee will not be prohibitive.

Cards of membership are issued to each one. To reach those who do not feel able to give even this small fee, in addition to their other benevolences, a fund has been provided to pay for membership cards which will be presented to such men in the church. It is thought that these fees will not only go into missionary work and produce the same good results as if paid directly, but in addition they will also interest some men in missionary work who may now be indifferent.

By these methods we hope to have every man in our church in the society. The society will recommend that the congregation take a missionary offering at least once each quarter. All the money collected in these different ways will be divided among the various missionary enterprises of the church, as the congregation may decide, but the by-laws provide that this decision is not mandatory but any person dissenting may designate any one or more of the mission fields to which his offering may be given.

We believe that this organization will prove a great blessing to the men and to the entire church. Without doubt it will very largely increase our missionary offerings, aid the minister in his local work and in presenting the cause of missions at home and abroad. It is already a stimulus and an encouragement to the local C. W. B. M. auxiliary. Our constitution is brief. We shall be glad to furnish a copy upon application free to any one who may be interested in this movement. C. S. Brooks.

Iowa Bible Schools.

Iowa has chosen a new Bible school superintendent, C. L. Organ having agreed to accept the invitation of the State Board. He answers the call in a humble spirit, but feeling sure of the hearty co-operation of the Iowa brotherhood, he is encouraged to take charge of this enterprise. Brother Organ will begin his work January 1, and plans are being formulated and sent forth to the churches in the state. The committee took six months to find a man suitable for the work, and the board approved their selection. He has for some time been one of the state evangelists and has done good work in this field. Brother Denny, in writing of the matter, says: "We commend him to the brotherhood of Iowa and to our God, praying that he may be the means of bringing our state to the front ranks in Bible school work. We fully recognize the good work that was wrought by J. H. Bryan in his five years of faithful service, and we believe that Brother Organ can take up the work where he laid it down and accomplish results that will gladden our hearts."

The Taylors at Hot Springs, Ark.

J. J. Taylor, our new corresponding secretary, and his wife closed a fine meeting for us. This was their first visit. When you take under consideration our location, and inadequate quarters, the meeting was a great one. Our house at times would not hold the people, even at so poor a location. Brother Taylor ranks with our best evangelists. Mrs. Taylor, who is a fine cornetist and soloist, is a source of great strength to a meeting. The State Board has the service of two able workers in Brother and Sister Taylor. Their meeting for us is an evidence of their ability. There were 49 additions, and the church greatly strengthened.

The Christian Endeavor International Headquarters Building.

A year or two ago a plan was set afoot to build a memorial building in honor of the silver jubilee of Christian Endeavor, and Endeavorers were asked to contribute the small sum of 25 cents each toward this object. Many thousands responded to this call and in all about $50,000 in cash and pledges came in; but it was found that the difficulty of collecting so many small sums threw the projected building into the indefinite future. Hence at the great convention at Seattle this year a new method of attaining the goal was launched. An organization called the Christian Endeavor Builders' Union was formed with 100,000 shares at $5 each, to be paid at once, or in instalments, to suit the convenience of the giver. This plan won instant and unanimous acceptance. Dr. Clark took 1,000 shares at once, although he had to draw upon the future to do so, and others followed his example. Some took 200 shares, some 100, some 50 or 40, or 20 or 10, according to ability, while some pledged themselves to find 10 or 20 or 50 members for the newly-formed union. This project will interest all Endeavorers past and present, because it is the biggest material task the United Society of Christian Endeavor has ever undertaken, but still more because the society has been, so to speak, forced to take this step to secure a permanent home, by stress of overwhelming circumstances.

THE WHY AND THE WHEREFORE.

The leaders of the movement have from the first aimed at making the United Society self-supporting, and consequently the expenses of the work have always been met by money earned by the publishing department and by Dr. Clark's own pen. Hence the society has not been obliged, like the great missionary societies, to make frequent appeals for money, because its work was different and its expenses were never excessively great. But when Christian Endeavor spread to foreign lands and calls came for assistance there, it was found that every penny earned by the society was fully engaged in the work at home, and hence Dr. Clark and Mr. William Shaw, the secretary, were obliged to take upon themselves the task of raising funds for the extension of the work abroad. This work has grown with every year and the time has come when it has become absolutely necessary for the society to seek back to its original position, that is, to be self-supporting again and free from the need of making annual calls for funds.

This is the great object of the headquarters building. It is not a luxury, but an endowment. When it is built it will furnish the United Society with the means of prosecuting its work in the future years without encumbering either societies or friends with requests for money. The present heavy rental paid for inadequate space will be saved to the work, and besides this, there will be a small income from offices that will be rented. These two sources and the profits of the publishing department will furnish the society with the modest sum needful for its present work, and not only so, it will enable the society to double its foreign work or more, besides materially extending its home efforts.

The executive officers of the Builders' Union are the same as of the United Society: Dr. Frances E. Clark, president; William Shaw, secretary, and H. N. Lathrop, treasurer. The finance committee consists of Hon. S. B. Capen, LL. D., president of the American Board of Missions; Hon. John L. Bates, ex-governor of Massachusetts, and Mr. Henry W. Peabody, of Henry W. Peabody & Co., Boston, all men of high Christian character representing three great denominations, the Congregationalists, Methodists and Baptists.

And now a more personal word. As superintendent of the Builders' Union I have taken hold of this work. I believe I am the first member of the Christian Church that has been officially employed in the office of the United Society of Christian Endeavor and I am glad to think that my brethren all over America and in other countries have been and are the staunch friends of this cause. We have stood for Christian unity and brotherhood, and Christian Endeavor has inscribed the same motto upon its banners. Hundreds of our preachers and our people have done noble service in the Christian Endeavor cause in days gone by and are still doing grand work, so that when I am addressing them on this theme I feel in the house of my friends. I feel confident that when our great building is completed it will be found that the societies and the members of the Christian Church will have had an honorable hand in the work.

I know the many calls that press upon the churches, and yet I know that we have learned the lesson of generous giving. For the gifts which we ask are not perennial gifts; they do not need to be repeated indefinitely year by year. They are a permanent endowment, a help towards permanent self-help.

All past and present members of our Christian Endeavor Societies will be interested in this great enterprise we have just entered upon. If they will kindly drop me a note I shall be glad to send them full particulars of our plan. I believe this work is God's work. It is a work that makes for unity and brotherhood. It is a work that encircles the earth. The blessings of Christian Endeavor have reached out to every mission field of the world. Who would not aid them in establishing a permanent means for the evangelization of the world by the young people of our churches?

Boston, Mass. R. P. Anderson.

Christian Fellowship in Connecticut.

It is not difficult for all of the churches of Christ in Connecticut to be on intimate terms with each other. For, in this great New England commonwealth there are two churches, at least, which are satisfied to be known simply as churches of Christ. One is the Danbury church, which for ninety years has stood, isolated from the great body of the brotherhood, for the New Testament type of Christianity. It is now a great church, full of faith and good works. The other is a weak, struggling, little orphan in Bridgeport, eleven years old. She is still suffering from some of the infantile disorders, incident to the nursery period in this inhospitable climate.

Not only have these two churches a speaking acquaintance, they visit. We have enjoyed three calls from our sister church in the last two months. And these were not fifteen minute society calls either, they spent the day. These visiting delegations have brought to us much inspiration and courage, and have caused us to see the beauty of Christian fellowship in a new light. Not only have they loved us; they are proving it. E. J. Teagarden, their minister, writes me that the church made the greatest offering toward our building fund it has ever made to any outside work; the pledges aggregating $1,000, with others to hear from. This is a beautiful act of Christian charity, and we want to express, in this public way, our thanks to the Danbury brethren.

The way looks brighter to us now, and if we can raise another thousand dollars in the next few months our proposed building will be assured. Bridgeport is a rapidly growing city of 100,000 souls. The New England Board believes that it offers the best opportunity in New England for planting a church after the New Testament model. But we can have little hope of arresting the attention and gaining the confidence of the community without a church home.

Work in Cuba.

The work of the Foreign Board was begun in Matanzas, Cuba, in 1902, by Brother and Sister Menges. They worked along against many obstacles but had success in their efforts. We came in 1904 to take up the school work. At the first of the year we were left in charge of the mission, and because of depletion in the number of workers we have no school this year. The five years of work are represented by an active church of about 90 members, a good, live Sunday-school and a Christian Endeavor that is a year and a half old, and would be a credit to any church in the states. This society recently gave an entertainment in honor of Brother and Sister Menges that was excellent and had a good effect on the people that attended.

We are at present working in an old building utterly unsuited to our work. The society has purchased property well located, but it has old buildings on it that are not suited, either. Our need is some good friends who will provide the money to give us the proper kind of a building so that we can stand respectably before the people and ask them to join us. The Cubans look at appearances a great deal and we must cater to their aesthetic tastes to some extent if we wish to help them spiritually.

A Christmas Greeting to the Home Missionaries.

[We are permitted by Brother Wright to print this copy of a Christmas greeting sent to all the missionaries in the home field with their December salaries.—EDITOR.]

My Dear Fellow-workers: Another year—the best in our history—is all but gone. The general results have been gratifying; our income was much enlarged, and sower and reaper both rejoiced.

And now the sweetest season for the year has come—Christmas! But Christmas would be robbed of much of its joy for us if you could not rejoice in this time

"Of glinting star, of manger low,
Of love that sets the world aglow,
While love-gifts swiftly wing their flight
From homes that gleam with Christmas light."

We are very happy that the Lord makes it possible, even in the time of financial difficulty, to send you herewith, and somewhat in advance, your salary till January 1, 1908.

May the birthday of our divine Lord be bright for you and yours; may his presence and peace pervade your heart and home; may good will abound, and the sweet spirit of the Christ-child make all the sad world glad. May every blessing be yours. Fraternally yours, Wm. J. Wright.

Children's Day for Home Missions.

A gain of something over a half thousand dollars is apparent in the receipts as compared with the corresponding time a year ago. The society is putting forth strenuous efforts to reach the $25,000 mark this year. All checks, drafts and money orders should be made payable to the American Christian Missionary Society, Y. M. C. NEWS FROM MANY FIELDS

Ohio.

[illegible] among the saints in Ohio [illegible] to keep track of all that is being done. We are able, however, to chronicle a few items that the brethren are interested in.—J. F. Lynn held a short and successful meeting with the Bellaire church early in December. Lynn and Van Voorhis renewed old college days and did much for the kingdom. In Brother Lynn's absence, H. H. Moninger filled the pulpit at Warren on Sunday, December 8, and gave good impetus to the Bible school work. John L. Brandt will be at Warren in January to lead in a meeting.—E. B. Bagby has been at the Huron Street hospital, Cleveland, for two weeks, recovering from a slight operation. He hopes for great improvement from the ordeal.—The good women have been having right of way in many of our Ohio churches this month. It ought to be so in every church. Mary A. Lyons spoke at Franklin Circle, Cleveland, and at Bellefontaine. Roy Brown, of Bellefontaine, spoke for the East Liberty auxiliary. Professor Paul was at Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, and Ashland. Dr. Mary Butler was at Madison Avenue and Dunham Avenue, Cleveland, and Bedford.—Mrs. Gerould presented the cause at Glenville and Painesville, while Mrs. Atwater, of Indianapolis, was at Dayton Central.—The whole state is rejoicing over the great victory in the Scoville meeting at Columbus. This meeting will be a great boom to our six organizations of that city. We have been talking city evangelization for a long time and how to do it effectively. The question seems to be answered. Henceforth Scoville and his helpers ought to go nowhere except where our several churches of a city unite in a great and worthy effort. There are many cities that need such an effort to unify our own churches for effective work.—It is with deep regret that we learn that W. A. Harp has been compelled to give up the work at Springfield. Mrs. Harp's health demanded a rest. She has been as actively in that work as her husband. They will spend the winter in Florida. L. I. Mercer, of Indiana, has been called to succeed Brother Harp. He is an Ohio man and comes back home. We welcome him back and pray for a continuation of the great success of the Springfield work under his leadership.—The opening of the remodeled house at North Eaton has been reported in THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. N. T. Sims, of Sullivan, will follow with a meeting of days.—F. D. Power has been in Ohio lecturing. Elyria and Painesville were served with "Blockheads."—T. W. Pinkerton lectured to the men at Painesville on December 20, on "Salt Lake and the Mormons." W. H. Pinkerton and the Saxons will be at Painesville in a January meeting.—J. R. Ewers will preach in his own meeting at Youngstown in January and Miss Ida Mae Hanna, of Cincinnati, will be soloist. She sang for this church one year ago in a meeting.—Homer Sala has been called to Wellsville and began December 15. I had not hitherto learned of Brother Prewitt's resignation. In the five years of his pastorate he has done a splendid work and Brother Sala will find a good pace set for future activity.—Coombs and Dawdy will besiege the sinners at Bellefontaine, beginning December 29. Bishop Brown and his hosts are working hard on the foundations, expecting a great meeting.—Violett is stirring the rusty old sinners at Belle Centre this month. Pastor Beckler reports a great meeting in progress.—On December 29 Brother Violett will turn his guns on the "dead in trespasses and sins" at Elyria, where John P. Sala expects a good harvest.—The Ohio scribe has just closed one of the best meetings in the history of the old Bedford church with a goodly number of accessions to the saved. On January 6 he will begin a meeting at Trimble, Ohio.—There will be things doing at Kenton in January, as Herbert Yeuell will be preaching the unsearchable riches to the people.—Secretary Miller rededicated the remodeled church at Stockport, Sunday, December 15.— This letter extends greetings to the Editors, managers and general family of readers of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. May you all have a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year and a great year of usefulness and happiness.—C. A. Freer.

Harlow at Wabash, Ind.

One hundred and sixty-four additions, of which 127 were baptisms is the immediate result of the Harlow and Dakin meeting here. Harlow stands by the Book and unfolds its treasures with perspicacity and force. Wabash is immobile, but Harlow caused an epidemic of Bible study to the good of the community.

Dakin has melody as a soloist and precision as a chorus director. For our community their victory is tremendous, passing all records. But best of all, I have found no Harlowites among the converts. They have united with Christ to work in his church, and we will reap for days what an auditorium too small by half prevented us from reaping immediately.—E. F. Daugherty.

Overcoming Opposition.

Oakesdale, Wash.—Upon reaching here May 1 to take the pastorate A. A. Doak found the town under the bane of a divided religious condition. There are five churches here. He found that good evangelists had been employed and meetings held annually for three years. He began to lay special emphasis on the work of the Bible school which had received so much attention. In a short time, however, the church decided to hold a meeting in November, a season in which a meeting had never been held in the town and have Brother Doak do the preaching and conduct the whole campaign with home forces. Three months previous to the date it was published in the local paper that the meeting would begin November 3. Three weeks before November 3 the Presbyterians started a meeting. Brother Doak called on their preacher, asking if they were going to continue; if so, that we would call off our meeting. The next morning the Presbyterian preacher reported that they had decided to close. But the same day the South Methodist minister said they had arranged to begin a meeting the second Lord's day, but eventually agreed they would not interfere with us. But there were other efforts to stop the work. Through all our pastor nobly led in a Christly spirit, and our people stood solidly by him. At the close of the second Lord's day it was found that the list of accessions was 19 in all. In the next week appeared a strange preacher, who attended a night or two with the folks he was visiting. It was but a few days till he had circulated a bill announcing he would begin a meeting in the Baptist church. At once we announced to close our meeting at that time. On the morning of that day the Baptists re-considered, and notified us they had called off their meeting. We then announced to continue another week and a lecture against saloons. The fighting force and some of the saloon element got the strange preacher to consent to preach, and rented the opera house for him and gave notice he would begin on Tuesday night. On Tuesday morning we posted copies of the following: "The 'official board' of the 'Christian church' desire to announce to the public that we are heartily in sympathy with any person or people wanting to advance the cause of righteousness in our town, or anywhere; and, believing that competition in such work is not the divine plan, therefore our meeting, which has been so well attended and blessed with a large number of accessions, is closed in favor of the meeting which is to be conducted in the opera house. The lecture for Saturday night is also canceled, that the way may be clear for a successful meeting."

We have had a great meeting and won a great victory. The firm stand and self-denying spirit manifested by our people all the way through have given us a spiritual dignity we well deserve. These six months of work have been most wonderfully blessed. The Bible school is practically doubled. The crowds and attention at the meetings are a spendid uplift, and the 30 accessions are in advance of any of the meetings of the three years.

We expect to hold another meeting in the spring, when these meetings are out of the way, and when the town has learned that we are above fighting, other than to contend for the faith. Brother Doak went to St. John to conduct their campaign to try to put out their two saloons at the December election and he is to hold a meeting for Brother Miller at his Sunset Church. On the recommendation of our East Washington Secretary, Brother Doak has been called to hold a meeting at Latah in January.—L. W. M.

ORGANS
"Playing the Liszt Organ is to me like interpreting a Mozart Sonata, and when speaking of that organ, it seems that I hear yet the exquisite sweetness of its tone.
"It has nothing of the nasal tone common to the harmonium, but the noble, harmonious, rich sonority of the pipe organ.
"The admirers of Wagner can now enjoy in private his orchestration, for the Liszt Organ possesses among its combinations an amazing imitation of the wood and soft brass instruments. The touch is perfect. In a word, the Liszt Organ is the ideal instrument for small churches and parlors, and considering its price, I would recommend it for all organ pupils as the most practical instrument." A Tennessee Meeting.

The church at Harriman, Tenn., has enjoyed a splendid meeting. Harriman is a cultured, conservative town with a population unusually hard to interest in a religious way, although from the point of view of morals both public and private, it will take high rank with any community of similar size in the world. From the beginning the meetings were well attended. James T. McKissick, of Nashville, is a forceful, eloquent and ready speaker, with a genuine vein of humor which prevents even the suspicion of a dull phrase in his sermons. He is a K. U. and Harvard man and one of the very best personal workers in the brotherhood. Captain S. O. Murphy, of Springfield, sang his way into the hearts of everyone. Possessing a tenor voice of extraordinary range and quality and a commanding presence, he likewise has all the graces of the polished Christian gentleman. There were thirty additions to the church, fifteen by baptism.—Frederick D. Kershner.

Armington (Ill.) Meeting.

The Christian Church at Armington, Ill., just closed the greatest meeting in its history. This is one of the oldest congregations in the state, having been organized in 1829. It has had some of the ablest men in the brotherhood as its ministers, the present one being John C. Lappin. One year ago a new $14,000 church building was erected, and money is now being raised to erect a parsonage.

In this revival of four weeks, there were 135 accessions, 105 being baptisms. Among the converts, 79 were males (62 being men) and 56 females.

F. A. Sword, pastor of the church at Polo, Ill., was the evangelist. Too much cannot be said in praise of his work. He is a young preacher of exceptional ability. He knows the Word and has a winning personality. One of his strong points as an evangelist is his exhortation. There were ten accessions at the last service. The meeting should have continued longer. Brother Sword is contemplating entering the evangelistic field next year.

The chorus of sixty voices did faithful work throughout the meeting. The night following the close of the meeting a reception was given for the new converts, and five men responded then to the invitation.

I sing next at Weldon, Iowa.

Charles E. McVay, Song Evangelist.

Winning Souls at Cherokee, Ok.

We closed a five weeks' meeting which resulted in 52 more souls added to the church. This is the fourth meeting I have held here in a little more than a year. Prof. C. M. Bliss of El Reno, Okla., assisted us in song the last three weeks. We all love Brother Bliss. If our place of worship had been twice as large we would have easily filled it and the results would have been greater. Our reception to new members was a high-tide mark. The Lord continues to bless our work and we are glad. We shall hold another meeting here in February.—G. J. Chapman, minister.

Pinkerton at Ravenna, O.

Our meeting conducted by evangelists Pinkerton and Saxton closed with 55 additions, all adults but five. Twenty-nine were by confession of faith. There being no Baptist church here a number from that denomination took fellowship with us. There is no one like Brother Pinkerton. His sermons appeal to the thinking element of the community and leave a profound and deeply spiritual impression on the heart. The church has been wonderfully strengthened. It was a revival that revived. Brother Saxton's solos were specially fine, and no one who has heard Mrs. Saxton on the violin can doubt that she has indeed consecrated that instrument to the service of God.—M. E. Chatley, pastor.

Healthful Cereals.

It is a great satisfaction to lovers of cereals to know that there is one line of cereal products made, not to meet the competition of worthless so-called breakfast preparations, but rather for people who are determined to have the best and most healthful foods.

These wholesome cereals—among them Cresco Grits, Barley Crystals, Cresco Flour and Special Dietetic Food—are made by the well-known firm of Farwell & Rhines of Watertown, N. Y., and are easily recognized by the well-known "criss-cross" lines on labels and trade-marks.

Physicians are familiar with their strength-giving powers and recommend their use to invalids.

A valuable booklet and a sample will be sent by the makers, on request. It is worth while to write for them, if you are not already acquainted with these cereals.

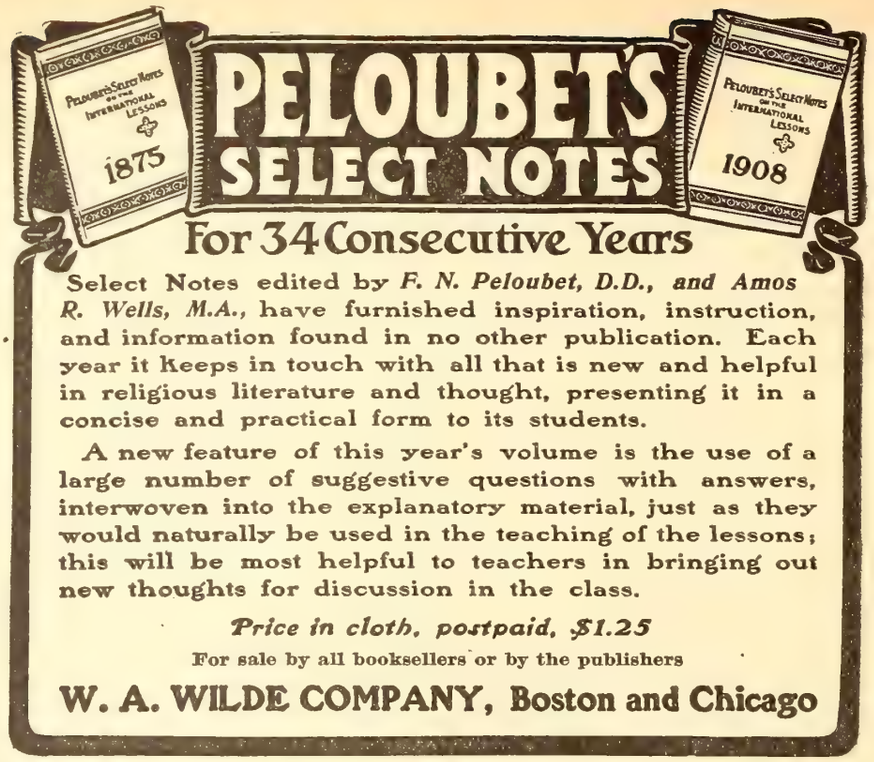
Western Canada.



The new church at Yellow Grass, Sask., has organized a Sunday-school with an enrollment of 32 scholars. Charles Bailey, editor of the local newspaper, is their superintendent. A pastor will be located at once and a church building erected in the spring. Brother Freeman, assistant superintendent of Baptist missions, called on the writer recently to discuss plans looking toward the union of Baptists and Disciples in Regina, also to arrange for the writer to hold a series of meetings for the Baptists at Weyburn. Charles Burton, a wealthy young farmer near Yellow Grass, has rented his lands and will devote his life to the evangelistic work in Western Canada. J. A. L. Romig has been holding a series of meetings at Red Deer, Alberta, assisted in song service by the Cane sisters from Milestone. The interior work on the church at Milestone is completed and we now have the best building in town.

A. R. Adams.

A Marvelous York in Los Angeles.

They say that the Pacific coast cities are hard soil for the seed of the kingdom. And there is much truth in the statement. Nevertheless in this "City of the Angels" may be seen the most remarkable, if not the most phenomenally successful work among the Churches of Christ, if one takes into account the element of time, limited original resources and present substantial achievement. At least this is my conviction after preaching to this church for twenty-five days and studying its character and life. I refer to the Magnolia Avenue Christian Church of which Jesse P. McKnigat is pastor. Only three years ago last February this church was organized by its pastor out of a little Sunday-school of thirty-five, with a charter membership of 87, in the heart of one of the most popular and populous sections of this beautiful city. It has already built two churches—the commodious and convenient edifice in which it worships—one of the very best in our brotherhood in Southern California, at a cost of about $27,000, and a chapel for its mission at a cost of about $4,000, and it has provided for all its debt. A statistical report made at its third anniversary service shows that the church has averaged about $14,000 per year. The gifts to missions alone last year aggregated over $3,000. Its present membership is more than 650, heartily united. In the almost four years prior to October 27 this church had never had a revival—or to speak more correctly it had had one continuous revival from its beginning—only four Sundays passing without additions to the church. Its Sunday-school—perhaps the largest among our people in California, averaging 400 for the month of November—is practically all that are of available age in the church. So closely does this pastor glean. So our meeting was truly an experiment. But it was a glorious experiment. It would have been an inspiration and a joy both to evangelist, pastor and people, if there had been no visible results. But there were results. Of the visible we may mention the 123 added to the church, of whom six were children and more than $900 subscribed by new members of the current fund, with forty yet to hear from and every department of the church strengthened by a large acquisition of new force. But perhaps the invisible results are more worthy of notice by the all-seeing eye. The Magnolia Avenue Church is the most glorious illustration known to me of what the Master's man, who is also a masterly minister, can do for the Master in less than four years. Among the men who are making our cause on the coast Jesse P. McKnight must be given a place and the Magnolia church as a vital, spiritual, religious force, is second to no church among the Churches of Christ on the coast.

H. O. Breeden.

A Note from Berkeley.

The last Sunday in November was a day which will be long remembered by the Berkeley Christian church. The day had been set by Brother McCash as a "home coming day." In addition to a general invitation to the congregation to attend, special invitations were sent out to numerous friends of the church to be present. In the morning the usual services of the church were observed. Immediately after the close of the services a large number of the members and their friends repaired to the basement where luncheon had been prepared. At 2:30 o'clock another service was held and Brother McCash delivered an impressive and inspiring sermon in which he laid great stress on the privilege and nobility of Christian service and the spirit which should characterize it. In the evening the usual services of the church were observed. Throughout the entire day Brother McCash seemed to be at his best and his preaching was exceptionally fine. There was a tide of spiritual power of which all present seemed to be conscious. Six persons were added to the church—two by confession.

Brother McCash has held only twenty-one services since coming to Berkeley, and yet fifty-five persons have been added to the membership of the church—more than one-half of them by baptism and statement. The church is taking on new life. Every department is growing. Especially is this true in the case of the Endeavor societies and the Sunday-school. The latter has more than doubled in attendance in the last three months.

Already Dr. McCash has sprung into prominence, not only in Berkeley but throughout the entire bay district. He is a preacher of "the Word." He is "instant in season and out." He knows the doctrine and preaches it with persuasive power. Never before has the Berkeley Church been more hopeful. Never has it been confronted by a brighter outlook. It blesses God that it has been able to secure such a leader.

Idaho Notes.

The financial stringency is likely to shut down the university plans for the Boise brethren. In this event we will not have the new church house for five years. The present building is entirely adequate for the present membrship, but it does not come up to the other church houses in the city. Boise is getting to be a city now of large dimensions, and it is already quietly hinted that the second church for the city will be started in the near future, when our people will nourish a bouncing offspring of their own as the Second Christian Church of Boise. This is a secret to date, but is that sort of a secret that can not be kept quiet longer.——Payette is about to have the second church house and organization. This is a town of 3,500 people and here the offspring would not get along as well as its brother in Boise, but yet it might make it win. In the West when membership reaches a little better than the three hundred mark it appears to be swarming time. Whenever they grow a queen cell the swarm is sure to follow. The Payette church building will not accommodate the enitre membership, and something will have to be done before long.——Idaho has a few churches that draw pretty heavily on the mission funds, while newly born or unborn churches get no help.

AND OTHER POEMS

The above-named book, by W. T. Moore, is the most beautiful volume that has ever borne the imprint of the Christian Publishing Company. A surprisingly large quantity of pure gold was consumed in decorating the cover. The poems are printed on heavy linen paper—the pages look like parchment.

In the contents of the book are found the humor and pathos, the learning and philosophy that have made this venerable, yet ever young scholar, the most picturesque figure among our churches to-day.

This will make a most admirable Christmas gift. Sent postpaid and with presentation card enclosed for $2.00.

Dedication at Hood River, Ore.

The little church of eighty members at Hood River, Ore., has placed itself on the roll of honor for heroism and breadth of vision. Two years ago W. A. Wood was called to the ministry of this mission of the Oregon Christian missionary convention, and they at once began planning for the erection of a church home. A beautiful site opposite the high school was purchased and work soon began on what is now much the best house of worship in this chief center of the Orchard district of Oregon. The property cost a little over $5,000. The extension board grant a loan of $1,500, but to secure it $1,900 had to be raised. Brother Wood and his people had made all possible preparations for the dedication services December 1, and called me to assist. F. L. Cook and members of his church choir had come down from The Dalles to lead the singing. F. E. Billington, state secretary, H. L. Ford, of the Valley church, and several of his members, and members of the church from Mosier and Odell were present and helped. When, after a season of real Christian giving, we were able to announce that the whole amount needed had been secured there was a season of great joy. I enjoyed my privilege. Morton L. Rose.

Forward Strides at Roswell.

The Hamlin and Daugherty meeting had a happy closing last Lord's day, when our new building was dedicated free from debt and amid the rejoicing of a united and consecrated membership. The building was enlarged and modernized at a cost of $7,000. To pay for heater, new seating and all outstanding bills, $2,400 was needed. This was soon subscribed under the tender appeal of R. R. Hamlin. The building is of brick, plastered with cement on outside for "old mission" effect, and finished and furnished on the interior in "Old Mission." The auditorium has a seating capacity of 600 besides gallery and pastor's study. It is heated by the furnace from the basement, and has seven large triple art glass windows. It is one of the handsomest and most convenient houses of worship in the Southwest.

I came to Roswell from Richmond, Mo., four years ago for my health. Under the blessings of God I have been enabled to do the best work of my life. Over 400 have been added to the church, the Bible school has been more than doubled and every department of our work greatly enlarged.

In an experience of eighteen years as a pastor I have never associated with a stronger evangelistic team than R. R. Hamlin and Leonard Daugherty. The immediate result of the meeting was 73 additions, mostly by primary obedience. C. C. Hill, minister.

Roswell, New Mexico.

Good Work in Oregon.

Our meeting in Medford with J. N. McConnell as evangelist, and G. A. Butler, the blind man, as soloist and chorus leader, continued four weeks. It was a splendid meeting, 35 becoming members of the local congregation, a goodly number by confession and baptism. The work in Medford is strengthened in members, influence, hopefulness and in finances. The pastor's salary was increased $400. To district work $60 was pledged. Brother McConnell is a successful soul winner, a man of splendid personal appearance, a fluent speaker and fearless, yet kind in his presentation of truth. Large audiences were in attendance, and a new house of worship will be a necessity. G. A. Butler, the blind singer, is a man of splendid ability as soloist and choir leader. His gospel songs added to the power and influence of the meeting.

To those who are conversant with the Medford church and community and the conditions here, this year's work and this meeting will be seen to be a great victory for the cause of Christ. A new condition, and for the better, is rapidly working out here. A new zeal, earnestness and expectation and desire for larger things is being developed. Seventy have been added to the church since January 1, 1907.

Marion F. Horn, minister.

Good Times on Hiram Hill.

There is "something doing" in Hiram nowadays. Early in November President-elect Miner Lee Bates visited the hill for the first time since his election. A meeting was held in the auditorium, which was addressed by President Bates, and by representatives of the faculty and of the student body. In the evening a banquet was held in the church parlors, which was attended by about 150 of the town's people, faculty and students. On the day following Mr. Bates attended a meeting of the board of trustees in Cleveland, and a banquet was tendered to him in the Euclid Avenue Church. The unprecedented enthusiasm awakened by the president's visit is still stirring in Hiram. On Sunday evening, November 24, a rally was held in the interest of the Ohio Education Society. This is an organization which is seeking to promote the interests of Hiram among former students and especially among the churches of Ohio. Short speeches were made by Professor Wakefield, by Miss Folks, secretary of the society; Mrs. Pounds, its president, and by Messrs. Baker and Teachout and Miss Robinette, representing the students. Dr. H. C. Hurd, treasurer of the society, presided. The meeting was full of what the boys call "zip," and if you don't know what that is you will be obliged to come to Hiram and find out. On Tuesday morning, November 26, a most remarkable meeting was held at the college. It had been suggested that an effort be made to enlist the students in the general advance movement, but in this the students themselves had taken the initiative and little remained for the older folk but to look on and admire the skill with which the young people marshalled their forces. After addresses by John E. Pounds, of the board of trustees; J. O. Newcomb, secretary of the college, and Prof. Charles T. Paul, representatives of the various college classes, told of the Each-One-Win-One League proposed by the students, and of plans already in operation for aggressive work. If Hiram does not grow it will not be the fault of the students, judging from present indications.

The trustees are not idle, but are working quietly to secure the additional $100,000 of endowment which is so sorely needed.

The attendance shows an increase of about 6 per cent over that of last year. All things considered this is an excellent gain, and helps to show that times are good on Hiram Hill.

THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST wishes all Christian Endeavorers a happy New Year.

"Blessed is the man who—" Who would not have a blessed life this new year! How can it be realized and kept? Is it possible for us all? It is possible and it may be realized through God's favor. This first psalm gives us a picture, we might say the picture, of the blessed life.

Why not begin the new year by committing this psalm to memory if you do not already know it. Put it in your heart that it may become the first and most beautiful and most loved song of the heart. Why not make it your ideal for 1908? It will assure your own blessedness and will make you a blessing.

Why not commit also the beatitudes which fell sweet from the lips of Jesus? Surely he knew where blessedness was to be found, and certainly he came to teach it and to demonstrate it. The eight beatitudes furnish an octave of blessing for the song of the heart.

In the psalm we first learn where blessedness is not to be found. The three negations should be accepted as the experience of the godly man who wrote the psalm. The experience of the intervening centuries and of our own limited experience and observation confirms the truth. Blessedness is not found in the "counsel of the wicked." Why then should a young Christian accept a non-Christian's definition of a good time, or accept his standard of enjoyment?

Nor is blessedness found in "the way of sinners." If you want a "good time" you will part company with your young friends who are sinners. Their way does not lead to happiness. "The way of the transgressor is hard."

Nor is blessedness found in "the seat of the scornful." Have you friends who scorn the Bible, the church, the Christian life? Do you sit with them in the places they choose for themselves? Do you participate in their pleasure? You will not find blessedness there.

Over against these three negatives is the one positive assertion in strong contrast, "But his delight is in the law of Jehovah; and on his law doth he meditate day and night." Here is the secret of blessedness to the man who wishes to be happy.

Do you delight in your Bible? Do you read it with such appetite that you think of it day and night? You are pledged to daily Bible reading. Is it irksome? Do you neglect it? You are in that case making your happiness impossible.

What is the blessed life like? "Like a tree planted by the rivers of water." How beautiful the trees were last summer. How eagerly we wait the coming of spring time to bring back their beauty. Your life may be as beautiful, as fragrant and as fruitful as a tree. This is blessedness.

And what does Jesus say? "Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Surely life will be blessed, yours and mine, when the kingdom of heaven is realized. And the hopeful thing about these beatitudes of Jesus is that the kingdom of heaven is promised for this earth.

This is an invitation for you and me to seek its realization in our own lives. This will make [illegible]. How is it to be done? Jesus said we should pray "Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth." Can you not consecrate yourself this new year to two things,—that you will delight yourself in the study of God's word, and that you will do his will as fast as you learn it? This is the way of blessedness which opens before you.

Midweek Prayer-Meeting

By Charles Blanchard.

First Things First.

Topic January 1, 1908.—Gen. 1:1; John 1:1; Matt. 6:33; Luke 9:59, 60.

A new beginning always holds the promise of better things. So let us be glad at the commencement of another year. But what we do will depend on what we put first in the new year as in life. "First things first" is a good motto for the new year and for the new life we are proposing to live. "In the beginning God" is the first revelation of the Bible. And the recognition of God in all our lives is the first thing. "For he that cometh to God must believe that he is and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him." No life can be anchored that is not settled in the conviction that God is and that "God is good," as Whittier sings in his "Eternal Goodness." It is not enough to believe simply that God is. Many a man believes that and goes his own way in sin and selfishness. Many a woman believes that and, like the wife of Job, would have her husband "curse God and die." There is a deal of the sort of faith that Job's wife seemed to have. Perhaps she is not a fair representative of womanhood, for women are supposed to have more faith than most men; but the sad thing about it is that the frivolous and faithless women are not few in the world to-day. To have and to hold fast the faith in God and his unfailing goodness and faithfulness is the only security for the soul in the stress of life's labors and losses. The great epic of Job will forever be true as a picture of the mighty struggle of the mortal with the material and the conflicts which grow out of our material surroundings, with the sufferings incident to earthly losses. To hold fast faith in the Almighty in the midst of it all is the triumphant thing in every age and in every condition. The justification of Job is the justification of God and of all good men and an illustration of the triumphant faith that will not confess to wrong-doing when the heart is innocent. Like Sir Galahad, "His was the strength of ten because his heart was pure."

Great words are few—great words are these:
Let Him do with me as He please—
Let loose the whirlwind, let the world
Grow dark at mid-day; houses be hurled
From their foundations, children dead—
These are the greatest words man ever said:
"The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away—
Blessed be the name of the Lord!"

These are the words of faith and not of fate;
These are the words of love and not of hate;
These are the simple phrases such
As they have learned who suffer much;
Whose hopes have crumbled into dust,
Whose hearts have tendered into trust!—
"The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away:
Blessed be the name of the Lord!"

Lord, touch me very gently, only make Me know in love the way I take.
Try me that I may come forth as gold
From the hot furnace. Let me behold
Thy face in righteousness and peace—
Out of the whirlwind bring release!
"The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away:
Blessed be the name of the Lord!"

And only as we put first things first and seek first the kingdom of God and his right[illegible], can we say these words. Dear Master, help us this new year to seek the first things, which are also the abiding, because the eternal things. And may we labor for the things that abide unto eternal life, remembering that we are called to receive an inheritance.

ATTENTION, SUNDAY-SCHOOL WORKERS!

How long have you superintended that school?

How long have you taught that class? Have you in that time really taught much for keeps?

Have you hid much of His Word in the heart for defence, for edification, for meditation?

Do your scholars love the Bible?

Do they know how to handle it?

Can they point out the way of Salvation therein?

Would you submit them to examination on the life of Christ or of Paul at any time?

The lack is not in the International Lessons, but in the lack of the reinforcement given by the Developed Supplemental Lesson Course prepared by Mrs. Laura Gerould Craig. One 25 cent book furnishes the complete course for all grades. It also includes a model constitution for a Supplemental-Lesson-Graded School, Promotion Day Program, etc. Adapted to any school, class or individual.

The Word Made Flesh.—John 1:1-14.

Memory verses, 1-4.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The word was made flesh and dwelt among us.—John 1:14.

The lessons for 1908 provide for six months in the gospel of John and six months in the historical books of the Old Testament from the establishment of the monarchy by Samuel and Saul until the end of Solomon's reign.

The gospel of John differs from the other three, which are called the Synoptics, partly in its method of treatment and partly in the ground which it covers. If we had only the gospel of John as our source of information about the life of Jesus we should say that his ministry occupied about one year and that most of that time was spent in Judea. We would know of only two brief visits to Galilee. We would suppose that most of his ministry was in or near Jerusalem.

John's gospel was unquestionably the last of the gospels to be written and is among the latest books of the New Testament. Criticism has attacked it vigorously, but the outcome of the critical process is a more certain assurance that the book really was written by the apostle whose name it bears, and not by some anonymous Alexandrine theologian of the second century.

The character of the book is largely determined by the fact that John was essentially a thinker and not a mere reporter. He was a profound thinker who reflected for more than half a century upon the words and deeds of Jesus before he made his record of them. In that time some things which had, at first, seemed important, fell into a secondary place, and others which had seemed less significant when he heard them in his youth became profoundly significant as he reflected upon them in his old age. This may account both for the difference in subject-matter and for the difference in treatment between John and the Synoptics.

The so-called Prologue to John's gospel (1:1-18) is the earliest of all history. Its "in the beginning was the word" antedates that other "beginning" in which God created the heavens and the earth. First of all, before all created things was God, existing as a divine being and also as a divine power capable of expressing himself in terms of material things through the exercise of that power in creative activity.

Hebrew thought, after it had succeeded in identifying the Jehovah of the Jews with the Creator and sustainer of all things, was sometimes troubled to understand and state the relation which a perfect and infinite God could have with an imperfect and sinful world. So "the angel of the Lord" was sometimes introduced to serve as the agent through whom God worked, so that he might remain holy and unapproachable without becoming too remote and ineffective. Sometimes it was the "Word," an undefined and indefinable something which represented the creative and revealing power of God without representing his unapproachable person and presence. As the priesthood was a device for establishing, for purposes of worship, a connecting link between a holy and inaccessible God and a lowly and sinful people, so this conception of the angel or the Word of Jehovah was intended to bridge the gulf between the perfection of absolute divinity and the imperfection of the world which he had created.

This conception of the Word as a link between the divine and the human was already familiar to both Jews and Christians in the latter part of the first century. John puts a new meaning into it. This Word, as conceived heretofore had in reality separated instead of connected God and man, because it had introduced a new being between them which was not obviously or clearly connected with either. John undertakes to say that the Word is not a mere abstraction, an imaginary and vague being that is really neither God nor man, but that the Word was really God, the eternal embodiment of his creative power and wisdom, and also really man, through becoming flesh and dwelling among us.

We can not hope fully to fathom the deep theology of this Prologue, with its Logos doctrine, but we can see the vital truths which are stated in a few of its verses. Among the greatest of them is this: "In him was life, and the life was the light of men." It was not merely as the embodiment of divine power or of divine truth that Christ became the guide and leader of men. It was because he had, in the fullest and richest sense, the life of God in him. Only life begets life. A revelation in mere words would have been as ineffective as a revelation in mere material creation. What was needed was a revelation of the thought and will and character of God in terms of human life. This Jesus gave when the Word became flesh and dwelt among us.

Union Gospel Songs

With the assistance of Singing Evangelist Leonard Daugherty and J. H. Rosecrans we have prepared a new song book that constitutes one of the best offerings we have yet made to the psalmody of the church.

It is called Union Gospel Songs because it unites in itself the best of the best old songs, as well as the most helpful and popular of the newer candidates for popular favor—234 in all; and also because it unites features making it equally valuable for regular church work as well as for the Bible school, prayer-meeting and evangelistic services.

No expense has been spared in securing copyrights of desirable music and in sending forth strongly and handsomely bound volumes.

Limp Cloth—25 cts. per copy, postpaid; $16 per 100, not prepaid.
Board—30 cts. per copy, postpaid; $20 per 100, not prepaid.
Cloth—35 cts. per copy, postpaid; $3.50 per doz. not prepaid; $25 per 100, not prepaid.

The space usually accorded a self-laudatory preface, the Editors have modestly given to the "Doxology" and "The Lord Is In His Holy Temple."

The merits of this book predict it will quickly come into widespread usefulness. We wish to accelerate this movement. Samples will be sent on application, on condition they be returned if order does not follow.

"FOLK-MCQUIDDY DISCUSSION ON THE PLAN OF SALVATION," between Edgar E. Folk, D.D., editor of the "Baptist and Reflector," Nashville, Tenn., and Elder J. C. McQuiddy, editor of "The Gospel Advocate."

This is a recent discussion appearing first in the "Gospel Advocate" and the "Baptist and Reflector," conducted by their respective editors, and discussing such questions as were commonly discussed between Baptists and Disciples a quarter of a century ago. This method of extending the knowledge of the truth is largely discounted at the present time and the conditions must be rare and exceptional which would justify any longer a religious debate. Neither the Baptists nor the Disciples of Christ would choose these men as their representatives if they desired to put forth a statement before the world of the positions which they respectively occupy.

FOR THE BEST THINGS. By J. R. Miller. Pages, 300. Price, 65 cents net; cloth, 85 cents. T. Y. Crowell & Company, New York.

The author of "Silent Times," "Come Ye Apart," and a dozen other excellent books, has his own place in our literature. His keen insight into and practical, yet poetic, treatment of the heart-life problem is unique. His latest volume is an appeal to the highest impulses. There are twenty chapters on such themes as "Doing Impossible Things." "Crosses," "Reserve," and "Roots and Roses." The book makes you put behind you the thought of briars and thorns.

THE SINNER AND HIS FRIENDS. By Louis Albert Banks. Pages, 359. Price $1.30 net. Funk and Wagnalls Company, New York.

Dr. Banks is known especially for his apt illustrations in sermonic work. This volume is one of evangelistic sermons and they are readable and fresh. There are thirty of them. Our chief objection is that while they magnify Jesus Christ to the sinner and awaken an interest in him, they stop at that vital point where the sinner asks, "What must I do to be saved?" without giving the explicit directions to the inquiring man. They are altogether too general, it seems to us, to be effective at a critical point.

THE WORLD TO-DAY.—This magazine is an evolution from the religious weekly, and is edited by a professor in the University of Chicago who has made a special study of certain New Testament problems. It has won for itself a place amidst the multitude of magazines, and we can cordially commend it as a helpful periodical in any home. Beginning in the December number is the first of a series of editorials in color, the theme of this one being "The Christmas Spirit Leavens Industrialism." These are to be a strong feature of the magazine during the coming year. Their purpose is to emphasize pictorially some of the sentiments that are now moving the American people. The pictures are to be non-partisan and generally non-political. They are, as Mr. Widney, the cartoonist, expresses it, "gunning for error—not its agents," and this error they will hit as hard as they can, but they are to have the saving grace of humor. Among other features planned for 1908 are a series of articles on "Our Colonial Empire" which will be illustrated, and the first of these is on "The Unknown Philippines" which proves a very interesting contribution to the December number.

Current Events.

alarming wave of prohibition which is sweeping over the country has convinced them that the days of the lawless saloon are numbered. While it is, of course, not true that every saloon breaks the laws under which it is licensed, it is true that a very large majority of them do so, and that most of the rest are merely waiting until the local authorities get careless in order that they may do so with impunity. If the liquor dealers are really sincere in their desire to see the laws enforced and obeyed, it will presently occur to them, even if the saloons themselves obey the laws, that their business is responsible for a large per cent of the lawlessness and crime of the country. A really loyal citizen who sincerely "deplores the nonobservance of laws" can not long regard with satisfaction and approval a law-abiding institution which produces law-breakers.

The Tariff On Art.

Whether or not there is to be any general revision of the tariff before the election—and most obviously there is not—there is one item on the schedule which ought to be revised without delay. That one (besides the tariff on paper-pulp) is the duty on imported works of art. Our present tariff is a protective tariff. It is confessedly designed to protect the American producer from the unfair competition of the "pauper labor" of Europe. Almost the only class of American producers which does not ask for such protection is the artists. They are not afraid of competition. The more of it they can get, the better they are pleased. They realize that the more beautiful things people see, the more will people want to buy beautiful things. Free trade in works of art is the best protection for the American artists, and it is all the protection that he asks. The exclusion of the artistic products of foreign countries, so far as it is effective, dooms us to provincialism in respect to art, and that injures the American artist both professionally and financially. We do not believe that the immediate removal of this tariff—which is, in fact, based upon the Democratic theory of tariff for revenue only, and is a strikingly bad example of that sort of tax—would unsettle business conditions, precipitate panic or materially diminish the chances of Republican success in the coming presidential election.

BERRY.

Mrs. J. F. Berry, aged 59 years, born in Trumbull County, Ohio, Jan. 19, 1848, married March 17, 1868, died in Dexter, Mo., Nov. 12, 1907. This is the short record of a faithful and lovely woman, the wife of a minister of the gospel, whom we laid away only a month before. She was a blessing to many.—G. T. S.

CARR.

Carr-Burdette College, Sherman, Texas, is the monument to the memory of my dear departed wife, Mrs. O. A. Carr. She gave the last thirteen years of her life to the college. I feel that she literally sacrificed her life itself to the accomplishment of her high purpose; for I know that she toiled with mind and body beyond her strength, forgetful of self. She conceived the idea of building the college, a Home and school for Young Women; she conceived how the funds were to be secured, and I am sure that without her they would not have been secured; she planned the building, which was erected under her immediate supervision, and there is not an idea in it that is not hers. She toiled and planned to within a few days of her death, and expended all earnings on improvements for the college, that she might attain to her ideal. Her wishes are well known, and, according to her heart's desire that the college should continue right on with its work, her purposes will be carried out as nearly as possible. The physicians said her sickness was grippe; but convulsions followed; and still the physician replied to me: "Yes, she will get well. Her pulse is good, her temperature right: keep her quiet." I told Mattie this, but she did not seem to think that it was true. She seemed semiconscious, under the influence of medicine, and could not express her thoughts. She rested well until about six o'clock in the evening, and then her poor weak body became cold, hands cold, and finally face cold. Death was without a symptom of suffering; she seemed to be sleeping when she died. I could not think she was dead; but the unspeakably sad fact was before me: nor can I even yet take it into my heart as a reality. It is like a dream to me.

Her funeral was conducted by J. H. Fuller and A. O. Riall, assisted by R. D. Smith and by Dr. Clyce, president of Austin College.

For nearly forty years Mattie and I have toiled together. She took responsibility, financial and domestic, from me and bore it herself. I was as a child happy in its mother's arms, cared for and caressed; and, as a child, I trusted to her wisdom and good judgment, and felt that all was right when she approved.

My brethren who read this will forgive me for trying to say anything now while I am scarcely able to think at all, and they will pray for me, I know.—O. A. Carr.

Sister O. A. Carr, nee Miss Mattie F. Myers, was eminently fitted by nature and by culture for the work of an educator. She was born in Stanford, Ky., Sept. 18, 1846. She became a Christian at the age of 12 and at 19 she had established a school for girls at Lancaster, Ky. In her 23d year, she and Brother O. A. Carr were married. They went at once to Australia where they resided five years. At Melbourne, she established a school for girls. Before returning to America they traveled extensively in the Orient. In 1873 she became associate principal of what is now Hamilton Female College, Lexington, Ky. From here she went to Missouri and at Fulton established Floral Hill School for Girls. Later this and Christian College at Columbia were combined and she was associate principal for three years. While in this position she was tendered the Chair of English Literature in the University of Missouri which she accepted and held ten years. Failing health made it necessary for her to resign. She then spent three years recuperating, during which time she was diligently looking for an ideal place to plant a home and school for girls. She finally decided upon Texas and came to Sherman to immortalize what will be an abiding monument to her sacred genius. She had a definite, clear cut ideal. To the execution of it she brought untiring energy and indomitable perseverance. She was an intense lover of the beautiful and was always at ease in any company. She was quick to read people and hence was strong in the discipline of her school. Her whole life daily was absorbed in the things pertaining to the success of the school and in consequence she denied herself most of the pleasures of the social world. The glow of her life falls, like the dew upon the mown grass, all around about us.—J. H. Fuller, pastor Central Christian Church, Sherman, Texas.

COOPER.

George H. Cooper, who spent most of his life in Iowa, died in Los Angeles, California, on Oct. 16, and was laid to rest in the beautiful Rosedale cemetery of that city on October 18. I first met him as a student in Oskaloosa College in 1876. When our first vacation came I found myself unable to reach my home for lack of money. When no one else felt like helping me in this emergency, he came to my relief. Only those who have gone through such experiences can imagine how warm a place he has held in my heart all these years. Before his departure for California in 1904, his home was in University Place, Des Moines, Iowa, where for several years he held a responsible position in the University State Bank. He was for many years on the Official Board of the University Place Church of Christ. He was universally trusted and highly esteemed by all who knew him. He was born near Cedar Falls, Iowa, on October 10, 1854. On May 6, 1884, he was married to Miss Hattie Otterman, who, with her four children,—Lyle, Lloyd, Marguerite and Harold, are left to mourn this great loss. Brother Cooper leaves also a devoted sister, Mrs. Etta J. Smith, of Mt. Carroll, Ill. A host of friends in many states will join in this tribute to a true child of God.

"You may value the friendships of youth and of age,
And select for your comrades the noble and sage.
But the friends that most cheer me on life's rugged road,
Are the friends of my Master,—the children of God."

Alfred M. Haggard, Drake University.

KISER.

Levi Kiser was born in Green County, O., September 21, 1823. In 1828 he moved with his parents to Tippecanoe Co., Ind., where he grew to manhood and married Elizabeth K. Chester, who bore him nine children, seven of whom survive. She died in 1873. He obeyed the Gospel in early youth under the preaching of John O'Kane, and was tutored by such fathers of the Reformation as Hopkins, Coombs, Jamison, Longley and other pioneers. He was one of the pioneers of Leon, Kansas, and served the church acceptably as elder, as he did in Indiana, Iowa and later at El Dorado, Kansas, serving in this capacity in all nearly sixty years. After a useful life, he passed away at the age of 84 years, 2 months and 7 days, at the dawn of Thanksgiving Day, November 28, 1907. The funeral at the Leon Christian Church was conducted by F. J. Stinson, pastor of the El Dorado Church, of which the deceased was a member.

PARDEE.

Elias F. Pardee died at his home at Volga City, Ia., Oct. 22. He was a member of the Christian Church.

FLOWER.

Alfred Flower, eldest son of George and Eliza Julia Flower was born near Albion, Ill., July 8, 1822. He married Elizabeth Orange Oct. 31, 1846. To them six children were born and five survive them. Brother Flower passed away at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Elizabeth Flower Willis, Oct. 6, 1907. Austin P. Finley, minister of the Highland St. Church, assisted by Harry Minnich, minister of the Main St. Church, conducted the funeral services.

Alfred Flower was one of the pioneer ministers in the Christian Church. For sixty-five years he has labored in his Master's vineyard. Much of this time he was tirelessly engaged in ministerial labors in Illinois, Indiana and Kentucky, and through his ministrations many hundreds of persons were brought into the church. He was a wonderfully interesting expositor of the Bible. His wide reading and broad culture gave him command of an inexhaustible fund of illustrations which he used with fine effect, while at all times, from youth till the great summons came to go up higher, his beautiful consistent life as son, husband, father, neighbor, friend, and minister, exemplifying as it did the high ideal of the true Christian, was an inspiration to all who knew him. Wherever he preached he inspired confidence by consistency in life and transparent sincerity, and wherever he went he was universally loved.

During many of the later years of his life it was his custom to spend much of each winter in voluntary evangelistic work. In this way he journeyed over a great portion of Florida. A notable example of the fruitful result of this work is found in the flourishing congregations of St. Petersburg, Fla., which now, very largely through Mr. Flower's tireless labor, enjoys a comfortable church building. Most of his time not spent in Florida during the later years of his life was lived in New York City and in New England, where he did much acceptable preaching and other ministerial labors in the great metropolis and in Boston, Worchester and elsewhere. His closing years were spent with his daughter, Mrs. Maurice Willis, in Worcester, where he became greatly attached to the congregation of the Highland Street Church, with which he identified himself as a church worker. Throughout his long and useful life, wherever there was sorrow, trouble or hard problems and perplexities confronting others, he was quite the true shepherd, unwearying in his efforts to lessen the load, to [illegible] the path, to lift the cloud, and to [illegible] tangled skein. He was constantly [illegible] marking articles or passages for [illegible] and leaving the reading matter [illegible]s, with notation as to what he felt they would like or find especially helpful; and by many in the tastes and needs of each a study, he was in this as in other ways a true helper. He moved toward the land of eternal dawn serenely, yet ever alert to help the faltering pilgrims and to be a guide and staff to those less acquainted with the way or less able to bear the stress and strain of the pilgrimage. As he neared "The Land of the Heart's Desire" his anticipation of great and exceeding joy at meeting the Master and the entrance into the company of the blessed was enhanced by the knowledge that first to welcome him among those who had preceded him from the walks of home life, would be his devoted wife, one of the noblest women whose saintly life ever blessed a home and who journeyed by his side for half a century.

PAYNE.

Jas. E. Payne, minister of the Glasgow, Ky., church, died Nov. 13. He had been a sufferer for two years from a sarcoma on the right arm. Various specialists treated him from time to time, and though a brave fight was made for recovery, he lost strength and vitality gradually until the end. He was born in Hardin County, Ky., Sept. 21, 1868. He confessed Christ at the age of 13 and was baptized by A. P. Terrell, and married Miss Ida Brown, Collierville, Tenn., 1892. His wife and two daughters, Mary and Louise, ages 12 and 14 years, respectively, survive him. Soon after entering the ministry he went to Tennessee and spent three years in general evangelistic work, after which he was called to the ministry of the church at Milton, Ky.—the Mt. Bird church, made famous as the home of F. G. Allen. He spent six years in that field, and removed to Hodgenville, where he lived with his family five years, preaching for the church two Sundays in each month, also serving the churches at Boston, Larue County, and Litchfield, Grayson County. Since 1904 he devoted all of his time to the Glasgow church. He has been unable to preach a great deal of the time for a year past, but throughout his sickness and suffering he has directed the work so that all departments of church activities have been kept alive and in fine condition by home forces. Brother Payne's labors here have been richly blessed. Over two hundred have been added to the membership during his ministry, and th church otherwise strengthened and built up. He was filled with the missionary and evangelistic spirit, and seldom preached a sermon that was not surcharged with power along these lines. He was well equipped for his work, being splendidly educated, cultured and refined to a high degree. His messages were prepared with the needs of his people in view. Personally he was a most lovable man; gentle, modest and unassuming, he never lost self-control, or forgot the dignity of his position. His big and tender heart always beat in sympathy and love for his fellows.—W. P. Coombs, Glasgow, Ky.

SAUNDERS.

Samuel T. Saunders was born in Nicholas County, Ky., June 20, 1857, and died near Urbana, Ia., October 22, 1907. With his parents he emigrated in 1844 to Boone County, Ind, and located near Lebanon. In early youth he became a member of the Church of Christ there. On September 27, 1866, he married Lucy J. Wilson. To them were born six children. Three died before their father. In 1868 Brother Saunders went to Benton, Iowa, locating near Urbana, where, with the exception of four years in Howell County, Mo., he has since lived. Two sons, a daughter, a faithful wife, two brothers, with many relatives and friends mourn their loss, yet not as those who have no hope. Brother Saunders was one of God's noblemen. The funeral was conducted by Elder A. B. Elliott, of Vinton, on October 24.—Malcolm M. Nie.

SWINNEY.

Irvin Swinney, born June 17, 1849; died November 16, 1907. He was married to Emma Davis in 1876, united with the Christian Church in 1878, and was faithful until death. The funeral was conducted by D. W. and E. A. Hastings at Floris, Iowa, November 17.

TAYLOR.

Mrs. Harmony Ann Taylor, born at Mentor, Ohio, in 1817, the daughter of John and Maria Stevens. In 1850 she married Wm. Taylor, who died four years later. Early in life she was baptized by Lathrop Cooley and was always a devoted Christian, manifesting a sweet and unselfish spirit. Always a great reader, in her eighty-fifth year she perused more than twenty thousand pages of literature. Her death came as the result of an accident, at the age of eighty-nine years.—E. P. Wise, East Liverpool, Ohio.

Yeuell—Spiegel.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

I want to add a partial endorsement to Brother Spiegel's comment on Brother Yeuell's article concerning Southern Baptists and Southern Disciples.

Brother Spiegel is correct in his statement that those who practise "close baptism" in the South are so few as to be a negligible quantity. It is also exceedingly rare that a Baptist uniting with us is rebaptized, unless he makes a specific request to be.

But I believe that the Southern Baptists, as an almost universal rule, rebaptize Disciples when they desire to unite with them. In fact, I have never seen a Baptist church in the South that did not do this. I would like for Brother Spiegel to name a few Baptist churches in the South that will receive a Disciple without rebaptism.

I want to enter a vigorous protest against the last sentence of Brotner Spiegel's article. He says: "Lord knows the South is ignorant and sectarian enough, if truly represented, without the necessity of hyperbolic descriptions." I believe that in intelligence, learning and refinement the South will compare favorably with any other section of the Union. I have not had much experience with Northern people in Northern states, but I have met and known intimately many individuals and families that have moved South. I have not seen in any of them any marked evidence of superiority. Their children are no further advanced than ours of the South, nor do the older ones seem to be any stronger mentally or more refined. I have no sectional narrowness that I know of, but it pains me sometimes when I see my people grossly misrepresented, and especially by those who should be the last to do so. Not many months ago a certain gentleman who writes often for THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, took a little trip through Louisiana and Texas. The lack of knowledge of Texas history displayed by him in some of his articles was pathetic. We of the South ask no favors—we only ask that those who write of us be just and know whereof they speak.

A Blow at the Liquor Traffic.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

In my judgment no measure enacted in years in the interests of prohibition of the liquor traffic has been so important as the measure that will soon be proposed to Congress directed against the manufacture and sale of intoxicants in the District of Columbia. The whisky forces are wild with fear, for if the measure carries, it will spell ruin in large letters to their business. It is the first move that has been made in a national way. I believe it will carry if all the churches rally to the call.

May I suggest that we all observe the second Sunday in January as District of Columbia day? If you will write an editorial on the subject, urging the preachers to call all the temperance forces together that day and asking them to circulate two petitions, one to their representatives and the other to the senator, I think the movement will spread like wild fire.

They ought to take a vote on the question and then wire their lawmakers the number of votes and a notice that the petition is on the road. My only fear is that the time is too short to do the best work. Yours as ever. W. T. Brooks.

[We hope if such measure is introduced that the preachers and editors of the country papers will call attention to the matter, and that the mails and wires will be freely used to inform the law makers in Washington how we feel about it. The saloon has been banished from the Capitol building; why not from the Capitol City? Stir them up!—Editor.]

As Seen From the Dome.

life. She was not less bright and companionable, but when the card clubs and dancing clubs organized she did not join them. She went to missionary meetings and prayer-meetings. She no longer read the Bible in secret. She took up work in the Sunday-school. Her husband went with her. Both awakened to the knowledge and joy of the spiritual life. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness."

It is the life that speaks. One may be taught all right. One may be gathered into the church in the most approved fashion. But what is your life? A preacher went to a hotel and wanted to take advantage of reduced rates. He said to the landlord: "I am a minister." "What, you a minister! I should never have guessed it. You asked no blessing at your meals. I went with you to your room and took away the light, and you did not say your prayers. You ate like a heathen, drank like a heathen, slept like a heathen; and I guess you'd better pay like a heathen." So it is the life that tells. Which way is your life going? Teaching, ingathering, training, but the greatest of these is training.

Dependable Books

—Jesse ben David. By James M. Ludlow. Illustrated by Sam'l M. Palmer. This is a beautiful story, inspired by the "Star of all the ages." What the shepherds are supposed to have told the wise men concerning what they saw and heard, and its starry wonders and angels' song is here retold in the most charming way.

—Man's Value to Society. By Dwight Hillis. $1.25. Hillis is no longer known as a successor to Henry Ward Beecher in the Plymouth pulpit. He has won just renown as a writer. Our last shipment of "Man's Value to Society" is from the 32d edition. This will be a most appropriate Christmas gift to any man, young or old, prominent or obscure.

—Pastoral and Personal Evangelism. By Ch les L. Goodell, D. D. $1.00. Dr. Goodell is a recognized authority in evangelism. His pages are not only inspirational, but are thoroughly practical, because they present methods that have been demonstrated successfully. His purpose is to promote a continuous state of evangelism in every congregation.

—Christ's Service of Love. By Hugh Black. $1.25. The author is Professor of Practical Theology in Union Theological Seminary. This book of sermons is designed for devotional reading, therefore the communion service is the heart and center. He declares it to be a perversion of the use of the word "communion" to have it represent what separates churches from one another instead of what should really unite them. He deprecates such terms as Episcopal, Presbyterian, or Baptist communion. This is one of the greatest books we have secured for our winter's sale.

—Singular Actions of Consistent Christians. By Wm. Secker. $1.00. This book is supposed to have been written more than one hundred years ago. It is a very remarkable book. Such marvelous combinations of aphorisms have never been seen elsewhere, by this reviewer. Perhaps it is known to many of our readers by its former title, "The Non Such Professor in His Meridian Splendor."

—Listening to God. By Hugh Black. $1.25. All the tributes paid to Professor Black's "Culture and Restraint," "Friendship," and "Christ's Service of Love" are richly merited by this book. This volume is of the same exalted character. He dedicates the sermons to the congregation of St. George's United Free Church in Edinburg, in happy memory of his ten years' ministry. We predict for this a large sale.

—Down in Water Street. By Saml. H. Hadley. $1.00. This is a story of sixteen years' life work in Water Street Mission, a sequel to the life of Jerry McAuley. It is a thrilling and intensely interesting book, mainly autobiographical; but it begins with a short account of Jerry McAuley. It is not only living testimony to the renewing power of the Gospel of John, but it is a valuable study of methods of personal work with those lost in vice and villainy.

We recommend each of these to our patrons.

The Home Department

December and May.

BY EZZA M. SMITH.

'Tis not always bleak December;
'Tis not always smiling May;
There's not always snow a-blowing,
There're not always blossoms gay.

Sometimes one, sometimes the other
As the seasons all appear,
Each in turn to fill its portion
In the cycle of the year.

Were it always bleak December
When the winds their requiem sing,
How our hearts would faint and falter,
Fearing what the future'd bring!

Were it always joyous springtime
With the snow-birds and bright flowers,
Would we not forget the beauty
'Mid the sameness of the hours?

There are glories in December
If Jack Frost does bite and sting,
For without the cold of winter
No arbutus in the spring.

Thus the seasons on their mission
Came to bless both young and old,
And we see as they are passing
More and more God's love unfold.

We're not always pressed by sorrow;
We're not always full of joy;
Life's not all of joy or sorrow;
It's made better by alloy:

Like December sorrow cometh
And our hearts are filled with pain;
But the joy that often follows
Is like sunshine after rain.

We must take what comes as blessing
Though it's often in disguise,
Like the clouds that quickly gather
And obscure the summer skies.

While in love God sends the seasons
On their mission o'er the earth,
So He kindly sends the changes
That await us at our birth.

So we're growing while we're living,
Hour by hour and day by day,
Whether in the bleak December
Or the smiling month of May.

We will grow in strength and beauty
And the character will stand
Every test of joy or sorrow,
If it's trained by God's own hand.

And when life on earth is ended
If we're pure and Christlike grown,
We will be among God's jewels
And He'll claim us as His own.

A Sensation in the Church.

"Some curious stories are told in connection with old Puritan customs," said Mr. Hezekiah Butterworth to a Boston Journal reporter.

"Some of the old customs seem very funny as we see them now. It was little less than a crime not to attend church in those old days, unless detained by sickness. In fact, a person who even came late to Sunday worship, was thought very little of.

"One Sunday morning, in early autumn, a Puritan woman whose reputation for housekeeping, spinning, and church attendance was excellent, was belated in her morning work. She took her long-necked pitcher and went to the pasture, where the cow was waiting to be milked. This duty done, she found—for she could see people in the road—that she hadn't time even to carry her milk to the house and get to church in season; so she took her long-necked pitcher along with her, and sat in the gallery near where the singers and bass viols were displayed. After the singing was over and the long sermon had begun—sermons were an hour or two long in those days—she grew sleepy. Her long-necked pitcher sat on the floor near by, and near the front of the gallery. She was soon oblivious of either milk, sermon, or a dog that came pit-pattering up the gallery stairs. The milk soon attracted the dog. He smelled it and wagged his tail, then smelled and wagged again, then looked inquiringly at the unconscious milkmaid. He made up his mind very soon, and into the long neck went the dog's head, and neck too. He couldn't get much milk, and wanted to pull back and try again; but he couldn't. His head was wedged fast in. He pulled and used his paws, and tried to pull away. Blinded, of course, by the pitcher, his steps were erratic, and suddenly, to the astonished people below, there appeared a parting of the balcony curtain, an almost blood-curdling yell was heard, and there was a flash and downpouring straight in among the four unconscious deacons in the deacons' pew beneath of snow-white milk, long-necked pitcher, and a milk-soaked, frightened dog.

"For once there was a great awakening in that church; but the poor woman was frightened nearly out of her wits, and the superstitious deacons were greatly scandalized."

The Last of the Year.

So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.—Psalm 90:12.

The last day of a year should make us thoughtful. We can not but ask whether we have been faithful, whether we have done all our duty, and whether we have learned the lessons set for us during the year. There is none who has not come short, and who has left no duty undone. There is none who has left no white page blotted.

One purpose of life is that we may grow, that in all the experiences of our days we may be learning new lessons and becoming better. Growth of the body is not all, nor is growth in knowledge the test of living. One may be physically stronger and yet be no better in character. One may know a great deal more, and yet be no wiser. We are growing only when the peace of our heart is becoming deeper, when we love more and are gentler, sweeter, and more unselfish. We shall want to make this last day of the year very beautiful—beautiful enough to be the last of our life. We should leave no duty undone when its last hour strikes.—J. R. Miller, D. D., in Morning Thoughts (T. Y. Crowell & Co).

What is a Man?

"All the constituents of a 150-pound man are contained in 1,200 eggs," said the chemist.

"There is enough gas in a man," he went on, "to fill a gasometer of 3,649 cubic feet. There is enough iron to make four nails. There is enough fat to make seventy-five candles and a large cake of soap. There is enough phosphorus to make 8,064 boxes of matches.

"There is enough hydrogen in him to fill a balloon and carry him up to the clouds. The remaining constituents of a man would yield, if utilized, six cruets of salt, a bowl of sugar, and ten gallons of water."

No wonder the Psalmist said, "I am fearfully and wonderfully made."

A Thankful Spirit.

Teacher: "Johnny, can you tell me anything you have to be thankful for in the past year?"

Johnny (without hesitation): "Yessur."

Teacher: "Well, Johnny, what is it?"

Johnny: "Why, when you broke your arm you couldn't lick us for two months."—New York Life.

THE CURE

BY ORPHA BENNETT HOBLIT.

Mr. Walter Parker was not in the best of humor. A consciousness of bad behavior is not usually conducive to good temper and he was proving no exception to the rule. Neither did his position, as he stood on the broad window sill, clinging with one hand to the top of the casing, while with the other he labored to screw the support of a curtain rod into the wood above his head, help him to the recovery of his good nature, which had been lost some ten minutes before.

His wife sat near by, sewing, with unnecessary energy, a torn curtain. Her lips were firmly closed, but, as she listened to the remarks which her husband uttered in the intervals when he stopped to rest from his painful exertions, the frown that marred her forehead deepened and a look of disgust and weariness gradually replaced the one of patience which she had worn at the beginning of his task.

"I don't see how I'm going to get this thing in," he ejaculated from time to time, still screwing away at it nevertheless. "The wood is hard as iron and it's so far to reach. If you had minded what you were about— But it's all of a piece with your characteristic carelessness."

"If you will let it alone, Walter, I will put it up when I finish this curtain."

"You!" in vast contempt. "I'd like to see you. No, you had better confine your attention entirely to tearing down. You're an adept at that."

"But, Walter, I have told you that I did not notice that the curtain had blown across the chair when I sat down in it."

"No," with great sarcasm. "I suppose not. You never do notice anything. That's a part of your make-up."

Another pause and the bit of metal was at last firm in its place. Then he grumbled:

"I don't see how in the world I'm going to get those rods away up there without a step-ladder."

"Wouldn't it be well to move the table over and stand on it? It is considerably higher than the window sill," suggested his wife coldly.

Mr. Parker did not condescend to reply but he did move the table and mounted it. Then his wife silently handed him the rods, and the curtains were quickly in place before the window.

"There," said Mrs. Parker brightly, and trying to smile at him as at last he stood before her pulling on his coat and arranging his tie. That was not really so hard, after all. Was it?"

"Not for by-standers," he replied cuttingly.

Her face flushed and her resolution to be patient flew to the winds. "You never excuse anything, Walter," she said bitterly. "One would imagine, to listen to you, that I pulled the curtain down purposely, just to make you trouble. Can't you see that it was an accident?"

Mr. Parker became, if possible, even more heated. "Now that's a falsehood, Mary," he said emphatically. "I do excuse many things every day. I'm obliged to. There are not many husbands as long-suffering and lenient as I am. But I draw the line at calling a great, blundering piece of carelessness like that an accident," and, apparently too indignant for further speech, he jammed his hat on his head and left the room, noisily banging the door behind him.

Left alone, Mrs. Parker let her work fall in her lap and leaned her head wearily against the back of her chair. A moment later, hearing through the open window her husband's voice and laugh in pleasant greeting to some acquaintance, a contemptuous sneer disfigured her face, which usually was beautful, with a delicate, mobile beauty of form and color that bespoke a sensitive nature.

"Agreeable and gentlemanly to every one but me," she thought. "No one out there in the street could imagine him the man he showed himself to be to me just now. If I had only known the two sides of him five years ago as well as I do now! Oh, well!" drearily, "I am not the same myself. To think that I, a woman with the standards and ideals I held then, should be bickering and quarreling with my husband, and over such trifles, such foolish, ridiculous things!"

"But how can I help it? It is unbearable. He is so exacting and so unjust. And I have tried so hard. I have determined so often that I will not quarrel, that I will at least keep my own self-respect. Why should it matter so much what he does and says? Why should I care, if I am not really at fault?"

Tears came to her eyes. Then she smiled. "Well, suppose I should not care any more? If it were any one else it would simply be a tiresome exhibition of temper, sometimes even funny. Why should I let the fact that he is my husband blind me to the true nature of his performances and disturb me so? I think I will take a different attitude toward it all. I might even, perhaps, get some amusement out of it."

A light shone in her eyes. Her smile broadened. She threw aside her sewing and ran to a table where lay a pile of papers and magazines. Hastily turning the leaves of one of the latter, she ran her eyes for a few moments over a few pages at the back of the book.

"Yes, even profit. He is certainly funnier than that sometimes. With a little judicious pruning and embellishment, which I know I could give, an artistic touch to the plot here and there, a skillful working up to a climax of the comic, which he sometimes omits, he will furnish all the material necessary, or at least a foundation to build upon. Why shouldn't I? No one would suspect. Isn't he called 'that courtly Mr. Parker?' He might, but he never reads such things, and suppose he should? He certainly has deserved it. It it would only save me from the necessity of asking him for money now and then.—"

There were no tears for Mrs. Parker that morning. For two hours she worked at her desk, now deep in thought, now writing swiftly, pausing at times to laugh gleefully to herself as the work progressed. Finally, flushed and exultant, she locked her papers away in a drawer and gave her attention to the preparation of the noonday meal.

Her husband came in to it, wearing an air half-ashamed, half-defiant. However, it was not a tearful wife who met him at the table, nor a sullen one. Neither was there any trace of injured dignity or of reproach in the bright face opposite him, although at times she did appear a little absent, as if absorbed in pleasant thought.

Wonder took possession of the soul of Mr. Parker. His defiant attitude vanished and the hang-dog expression deepened in his face. He did not leave at once when the meal was finished, but lingered at the table, although his replies to his wife's remarks grew more and more brief and incoherent. Finally, with a visible effort, he said:

"Then you aren't cross any longer, Mary?"

"Cross? No. Why do you—"

"Oh, nothing," evidently relieved. "I thought you might be. You know you have a very unpleasant habit of harboring resentment a long time, without sufficient cause, over nothing, in fact. I'm glad you are learning to be more sensible. I mean, of course, I—well, I suppose I did speak a little too sharply this morning, but I was—you were—"

"Oh, never mind that now, Walter." Mrs. Parker was plainly amused. I have been thinking it may not have been such a bad thing after all," and, with that enigmatic response, Mr. Parker was perforce content.

A few more mornings spent at her desk and the little sketch was finished. The fair writer smiled and dimpled, as she read it over for the last time before mailing it, and she laughed exultantly, a few weeks later, on receiving a letter from her editor enclosing a check for a generous amount, and a request for a series of papers in the same vein.

she had been steadily writing, although obliged to draw upon her memory almost entirely for material, since, during this time, Mr. Parker had been unusually amiable and considerate. Bitter and painful memories, which she had long endeavored to forget, she now dragged mercilessly forth, and rejoiced to find in each, as she held it up in the light of her new purpose, the comic element she sought. Then, skillfully manipulated, often almost transformed by the work of her active imagination, they were turned into the clever sketches which brightened the pages of a popular magazine. Analyzed and dissected, viewed in the impersonal light in which she now regarded them, these incidents lost for her their bitterness, for she saw them as trivial, amusing, often wholly unnecessary. Her own part in them frequently took on a different appearance, now that she could look on it as an outsider, and she often found herself wondering at her own behavior, or that the matter could have ever seemed to her a serious one.

However, she had not long to depend upon memories alone. Things went awry one day in Mr. Parker's office. To add to his discomfort his hat blew off as he stood on the steps of his home, waiting for an answer to his ring, his pass-key having been forgotten. Therefore it was with a frown and an inarticulate growl for a greeting that he met his wife.

"Pity you can never be on hand when you are wanted," he said, with an injured air, as he stood in the hall, brushing away the dust from his battered head-gear. "A hat like that is an expensive thing. I can't afford a new one every time I am kept waiting out there in the cold until it suits your convenience to come to the door."

"I supposed you always carried your key, Walter, and thinking it must be some caller. I waited a moment to arrange——"

"Waited to arrange—a moment! I stood there cooling my heels fully ten minutes. Yes, ma'am, certainly long enough to have contracted a severe cold. You know how delicate my chest is since that attack of the grip. But you don't care. Any caller would have taken her departure in half the time. If that is the way you are in the habit of treating your friends who take the trouble to come to see you, I don't wonder that you are so unpopular among the women of this community. It is a hard task for a man to have to continually smooth over his wife's lack of ordinary courtesy."

Mr. Parker heard a strange sound. He looked up from his hat, restored now to its wonted trimness, and stared at his wife, not even the shrinking, apologetic wife he might have expected to see, not even an angry one. She was laughing, audibly, heartily—and at him.

Amazement and indignation choked him, but, as he gazed and saw his wife's merriment increase until it became almost hysterical, his anger gradually oozed away, and he stood puzzled and confused, then, as the meaning dawned upon him, self-conscious and sheepish.

"What ails you, Mary?" he managed to say finally. "I don't see anything to laugh at."

"Oh, Walter, you are so comical."

Comical! He was dumb for a moment in his astonishment, but said at last, trying to speak with dignity, though half-smiling himself as a realization of his own behavior came to him, "I'm glad you can enjoy it then," and turning he beat a hasty retreat to his room. However, it was a mild and amiable Mr. Parker who, some minutes later, joined his wife in the dining room.

Great is man's fear of ridicule and great is the power of a smile. The passing months brought a change over the spirit of Mr. Parker in his home. His outbursts of injured eloquence became fewer and fewer and his wife's frank amusement upon hearing these few speedily brought each of them to a lame conclusion. Gradually, though with occasional lapses, he seemed to learn his lesson. Justice and self-control first. Then, these mastered, he even went a step further and began to practice generosity and charity in the face of really annoying incidents. The effect was certainly to make his home a more pleasant place, and it gave him a feeling to which he had long been a stranger, of thorough self-respect. As for his wife, in the atmosphere of such forbearance, appreciation and praise she fairly bloomed. Meanwhile she had tried to continue her writing. As long as her sketches were built upon fact they found a ready acceptance. The time came, however, when she was forced to draw wholly upon her imagination, since Mr. Parker no longer furnished her with the rough material for her work. Then, either because her imagination could not act without this stimulus, or because, in the light of her husband's new character, she had lost heart for the task, the quality of her work suffered. She felt this herself, and it was with no feeling of regret, but rather of relief, that she received one day, in lieu of a check, one of her own manuscripts and a polite note from the editor regretting his inability to make any further use of work of that particular character.

She took out the back numbers of the magazine and re-read the articles. They were amusing, especially the earlier ones, but she no longer enjoyed them as she might have done if another had written them. What had been truth once seemed to her now offensive exaggeration, and her own action in writing them had lost all

Once Said the Way to Keep the Stomach Healthy Is To Exercise It.

But He Did Not Tell How to Make It Healthy.

The muscles of the body can be developed by exercise until their strength has increased manifold, and a proper amount of training each day will accomplish this result, but it is somewhat doubtful whether you can increase the digestive powers of the stomach by eating indigestible food in order to force it to work.

Nature has furnished us all with a perfect set of organs, and if they are not abused they will attend to the business required of them. They need no abnormal strength.

There is a limit to the weight a man can lift, and there is also a limit to what the stomach can do.

The cause of dyspepsia, indigestion and many affiliated diseases is that the stomach has been exercised too much and it is tired and worn out. Not exercise but rest is what it needs.

To take something into the stomach that will relieve it from its work for a short time—something to digest the food—will give it a rest and allow it time to regain its strength.

The proper aid to the digestive organs is Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, which cure dyspepsia, indigestion, gas on the stomach and bowels, heartburn, palpitation of the heart and all stomach diseases.

Rest and invigoration is what the stomach gets when you use Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, for one grain of the active principle in them is sufficient to digest 3,000 grains of food.

The Tablets increase the flow of gastric juice, and prevent fermentation, acidity and sour eructions.

Do not attempt to starve out dyspepsia. You need all your strength.

The common sense method is to digest the food for the stomach and give it a rest.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets do not make the cure, but enable the organs to throw off unhealthy conditions.

Perfect digestion means perfect health, for under these conditions only do the different organs of the body work right and receive the building-up material found in pure blood.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets is a natural remedy and is a specific for stomach troubles. The ablest physicians prescribe them.

The Tablets are pleasant to the taste, and are composed of fruit and vegetable extracts, golden seal and pepsin.

justification of motive and appeared tinged with disloyalty and spite. She spent a bad hour over them alone with her conscience, and a very dejected and humble little woman her husband found, as he came upon her afterwards, seated on the floor among them.

"Why, my dear, what are you doing with so many old magaiznes?" he asked in surprise.

"Nothing but—I was only—I thought I would look over these f-funny articles again," she said in a quavering voice.

"Not very funny, I imagine, if they make you look so doleful. Let me see." He stooped for the one in her lap.

But she held it fast. "No, Walter, wait a minute. I want you to read them, I do, truly, but I want—I must—oh, Walter; they are not true now, if they ever were, and I'm so sorry I wrote them. I'm so ashamed."

"You wrote them!" In his amazement Mr. Parker did not notice his wife's tearful and hurried exit from the room. He was staring in wonder at her name on the page open before him. Then down he plumped on the cushion which she had vacated, and there was a long silence as he read the sketches, one after another, recognizing himself as their hero. Mr. Parker was not a saint, and he certainly did grow very angry before he was half through with the first. In fact, his face was purple with rage, but he read on and on, as if fascinated, and little by little his anger gave place to shame and something like a grim sort of amusement.

"Good for you, little woman," he chuckled once. "You certainly evened things up there." And later: "Poor little soul! I was a brute that time."

Finally, with a very grave face, he laid the last one thoughtfully aside, and sat for some time pondering deeply, his chin in his hands. Then he gathered the magazines up carefully and went in search of his wife. He found her lying across the bed in an attitude of deepest woe. She sat up as he entered and stretched out her hands to him.

"Oh, Walter, can you forgive me?"

"My dear," said her husband, smiling tenderly into her tear-stained face, "It is rather a bitter dose, but I certainly deserved it all the time. Honestly, though, I believe I am cured, and I hope you will never have any occasion to do anything of the kind again. However, if I ever do treat you in that fashion again, I give you full permission to write me up for the public in any style you may fancy."

Judging from this, may we not also believe that Mr. Parker was, as he said, really cured?

The heroism of the days to come must grow out of the heroism of the days that have been.—O. W. Nixon.

The Last Ships of the Year.

The ship is sailing out to-day—
Away, away, away.
The cold stars glare from out the sky,
And flaming northern light on high
Falls burning on the bay.

On distant hills the flick'rings go
Beneath the ruddy glow.
An echo's voice is thundering now,
As plunges o'er the mountain's brow
An avalanche of snow.

The winter here is long, my girl,
But bright with snowy pearl
And stately clouds with crowns of fire
Or shifting dome and changing spire,
'Mid stellar calm and whirl.

The Arctic night is long, but morn
Will in the sky be born,
With glowing glory ruddy-bright,
And burst of fulgent solar light,
The pale earth to adorn.

We'll live our little life away
By adding day to day.
And be the living better here,
Or in the lands of summer's cheer,
Nor you nor I can say.

For love is love, where e'er it be,
On mountain or by sea,
And by its softly beaming light
Illumined in the mortal night—
And happy then are we.

What Shall I Let Go With the Old Year?

One of the secrets of right living is letting that go which absorbs our energies and retards our progress. We should let our unfortunate past experience drop into the world of oblivion. We should never recall a disagreeable memory or mistake, unless it be to arm ourselves against falling into further errors. If the past torments and haunts you, cut it off sharply as if with a knife. Do not allow its shadow to darken your present, or rob your future of its possibilities. Profit by the lessons it has taught, but do not morbidly brood over them.

Why should you suffer your mind to be clouded with fear or anxiety? Why let doubt or worry destroy all your happiness? Why allow them, like ghosts, to glide through your mind unbidden, day after day, year after year, when you have the power to expel them, to expunge them as if they had never existed? In fact, they do not exist. They are not realities; they are but the delusions of an unhealthy imagination. Only the good is true; only that which is healthy and helpful exists in ultimate reality.

Those things which mock our success, which fill our lives with terror, pain, and mortification, which chill our blood with fear, and crush our happiness, have no tangible existence. Analyze the causes of your unhappiness for a single day, and you will find that they were anxiety, doubt, fear that something might happen, expectation of disaster that never came. These are not realities, but are merely the ghosts conjured up by a morbid mental condition. If we hold ourselves receptive to the influences of the all-creative mind which guides the universe, if we open our minds to the eternal verity that all things are ordained for good, and that evil has no place in the universal plan, we can learn to rise above our paralyzing fears and doubts, as a child rises into the consciousness of the unreality of ghosts which once seemed so real to him. New-year resolutions have been easily made and easily broken ever since the dawn of civilization. Every new year seems brighter and more hopeful than the last, and we are ever ready to give our lives a new trial and shake off bad habits. The trouble lies in not being able to keep the new, good resolutions which we make. We need to be more persistent in doing right, living right, and working right.—O. S. Marden, in Success.

Children are given to us as a mirror, in which we may behold modesty, courteousness, benignity, harmony and other Christian virtues, the Lord himself declaring, "Unless ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven."—Johann Amos Comenius.

Making a Great Speech.

A lawyer whose eloquence was of the "spread-eagle" sort, was addressing the jury at great length, and his legal opponent, growing weary, went outside to rest.

"Mr. B—— is making a great speech," said a countryman to the bored counsel.

"Oh, yes; Mr. B—— always makes a great speech. If you or I had occasion to announce that two and two are four, we'd be just fools enough to blurt it out. Not so Mr. B——. He would say: 'if by that particular arithmetical rule known as addition, we desire to arrive at the sum of two integers, we would find—I say it boldly, sir, and without the fear of successful contradiction—we, I repeat, should find by the particular arithmetical formula before-mentioned—and, sir, I hold myself perfectly responsible for the assertion I am about to make—that the sum of the two given integers added to the other two integers would be four.'"

A Pied Zoo.

BY ALBERT OSBORN.

'Twixt the stomach and head
Our little boy Ned
Found the link in one night—
Partly fun and much fright.

Being hungry he ate
From his well-filled plate,
For three boys quite enough
Of rich and sweet stuff—
Preserves, nuts and cake
Of the very best make,
Topping off, with a sigh,
On a huge piece of pie
Well known as the mince,
Oft making men wince.

An hour swiftly sped,
When into his bed,
Where he usually slept,
The lad slowly crept,
He thought, to repose;
But the greatest of shows
Soon burst on his sight
In the dead of the night.
'Twas the zoo in a mix,
And the strangest of tricks
Went on at a rate
To muddle one's pate.
The great antlered moose
Was chasing the goose;
The striped hyenas
All decked with verbenas,
And the vast hippopotamus
Raised a great lot o' muss,
Howling and moaning,
Whirling and groaning,
Roaring with rage
Round the tiger's cage.

The sleek anaconda
Plucked off and downed a
Crest bright and red
From the cockatoo's head.

The great horned owl and the paroquet
Joined in a hideous, loud duet;
The turkey pulled from the ostrich a plume
And put all the swans in an envious fume;
The kangaroo sprang to the elephant's trunk
Then fell in the beavers' dam kerplunk;
The zebra traded stripes with the 'coon,
And the eagle shrieked with the crazy loon.
The babboon danced with the polar bear,
And the sea lion flopped to the black wolf's lair.
Snakes wriggled and fought till one was victor—
By coils and hugs—the boa constrictor.
The panther and wildcat rode on the ox,
While the lynx and badger raced with the fox.
The rabbit stood still and trembled with fear
While he watched the condor eating a deer.
On the long, smooth neck of the meek giraffe
The monkeys climbed to chatter and laugh.
Then flew the stork at the rhinoceros
And circled his head like an albatross.

The peacock spread his gorgeous tail
And threw his shadow on snipe and quail.
With his ivory tusk of bright enamel
The elephant bored the ugly camel.
The lion pawed and made his bow
To the clam-eyed, spotted, sacred cow,
The prairie dog a moment later
Tickled the nose of the alligator;
And then the face of the crocodile
Broke in a broad and ugly smile.
The woodchuck peeped from his earthly cloister
And saw the clam propose to the oyster.
Trout and goldfish told it to salmon,
Who scouted the tale and pronounced it gammon.

The gossip grew by gill and fin
Until amid the clatter and din
The sides broke out of the grand aquarium
Which ran as dry as an old herbarium.
To escape the flood which rushed toward Ned,
He sprang for his life from his tumbled bed,
Struck and sprawled on the hard wood floor,
Then groaned and said, "Mince pie? No more."

Driving Bad Dreams Away.

Helen woke up crying. She had had a bad dream and was frightened.

Her father came to comfort her, but she could not forget the dream.

Then her father said: "How many robins were there on the tree last night?"

"Six, father, and I gave them some bread."

"And will the robins come back to-morrow?"

"Yes, and I will give them some more bread."

Before she knew, she forgot all about the bad dream and went to sleep again.

Dean Hanley spoke of "the magnetic force of genuine goodness."

Advance Society Letters.

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

Last year, I worked pretty hard at getting up for our missionary a Christmas tree,—which was just another way of saying that we were trying to raise money to keep her supported in far-away China. By continually harping on that one string, I finally succeeded in producing some music to the tune of $105,60.

This year I didn't plead for special gifts, hoping that the different friends of the Advance Society would send a dime, or nickel, or something like that, of their own free will,—because they might want to help, if ever so little, in this missionary work. But bless your hearts! you have spent those nickels and dimes buying presents for your kinfolk and friends; so, as this is the 25th, I sincerely hope all of you are enjoying yourselves; and hurrah for Christmas, anyway!

Here comes a picture of a beautiful building in Nevada, Mo. It is where our faithful member, Mrs. W. A. Mason, goes to church. "We have a church to be proud of," she writes. "We observed C. W. B. M. Day with a good program. The C. W. B. M. numbers 62. I enjoy the letters of our missionary Drusie very much. She is certainly a beautiful character."

In Blepek, Pa., the Av. S. is hard at work, as witness this from John Devall: "I am now making out the report of my third quarter. History is dry to me, but since I began the Advance Society, I no longer moisten it with my tears. After what you said, I would be afraid to try to send you a picture of Felix. I suppose Felix will think it just as well for John Lloyd to keep his Newfoundland pup in Kansas. We are going to have a box supper in our schoolhouse the night before Christmas Eve; and Christmas Eve we will have a big tree. Most of us have thrown in to buy our teacher a present, but she doesn't know anything about it. At least, she wasn't to know, but I think she has been looking a little queer lately. It is hard to keep a secret among so many boys and girls. She drives four miles from her father's farm to teach us every morning, and we have bought her a beautiful silver-tipped buggy-whip. Don't you think it shows a good deal of confidence in her, for her pupils to present her with a whip?"

In Danville, Ill. there is a very flourishing band of Av. S. members, all in the same family. Dorothy Brown writes: "It has been a good while since I wrote to the Av. S.; since then, I have changed my address. I am sending with this letter my 9th, 10th, 11th and 12th quarterly reports. That looks as if I had been careless in sending them, doesn't it? I have been so busy, it seems like I don't have time to write after I get the reports ready. My brother Earl sends his 5th and 6th reports with mine, and Myrtle sends her 3rd and 4th quarterly reports."

All these reports are at hand, which puts Dorothy, Myrtle and Earl on the Honor List again and yet again. One of Dorothy's quotations is a long stanza from Whittier, containing this striking thought:

"In months of sun, so live that months of rain
May still be happy."

From Ivanhoe, Minn., where Rebecca should be living, to say nothing of Rowena (for whom Scott has already said more than enough), comes this inquiry; from a proprietor of the Sunnyside Stock Farms (and, by the way, what a pleasant name for a farm!): "I am requested by two young ladies to obtain the exact condition upon which an Av. S. pin may be bought and worn. I think the wearer is expected to have kept the rules for three months. Is this correct?"

I have answered Mr. Olsen personally, but repeat it here for the information of others. One does not take a pledge in joining the Av. S., hence we do not have that breaking of serious promises which is the disadvantage, I think, of the Christian Endeavor Society. One becomes a member simply by determining to keep the rules; if the resolution is broken, no promise is unkept, and so far from any harm resulting, the little that may have been done was a positive benefit. Therefore, whoever honestly resolves to keep the rules, and begins to keep them, may wear the Av. S. pin (gold, 90 cents); and should the 3 months never be kept fully, the pin will show that its wearer once had a very praiseworthy desire for self-improvement, and a will to put that desire to practical account.

But don't suppose I am opposed to Christian Endeavor. It has a hundred blessings for its one drawback. I have just been looking at the annual report on Church Extension—the work, you understand, of lending money to people too poor to build meeting houses, making the payment of the loans easy, and at comfortable intervals. The Endeavor Society of Bentonville was the only one in the state of Arkansas that contributed to this noble missionary enterprise; and the societies of but 5 towns in Missouri gave a penny. Figures are very interesting if you know how to dress them. Let us look at some figures a minute, and I will officiate as the Paris milliner or dressmaker.

We admit at the start that in the number of churches in Arkansas contributing this year to Church Extension, compared to last year, there's a loss of one. I don't know what miserable church that was, but it wasn't in Bentonville. Now, having confessed our own state's faults, just glance at Missouri, will you? Missouri has lost 14 churches this year from the noble rank of those contributing for their needy brethren. Do you ask, What has Church Extension ever done for Missouri? Oh, it's done a little; it has loaned to 90 different struggling congregations a sum total of $71,233.-69! Never mind the 69 cents, however. Call it just $71,233, if you want to. Queer way Missouri has of showing its gratitude, don't you think? 14 churches lost from the paying roll! There's not another state in the Union that has lost so many churches from the front of battle for Church Extension. I wouldn't say so much about it, if I didn't love Missouri so well. I was born there; but it has lost 14 churches from those helping the heroic poor, who are resolved, in the face of poverty, opposition and indifference, to make a visible stand for God. 14 churches in Missouri that helped last year, refused to give a penny this year!

Brother Muckley, is that a misprint? Is there any mistake about that? The most contemptible falling-off I can find that at all approximates Missouri, is the loss of 11 churches in Pennsylvania. On the other hand, new-born Oklahoma shows a gain of 15. And Kansas (of which Missouri has always had its own opinion) shows a gain of 8. The greatest gain of all is Indiana with its 25 new-paying churches; Indiana, the home-center of the C. W. B. M.; the homebase, so to speak, where the Tidings makes its strongest hits for missions; which shows that the more you do for one mission makes you want to do all the more for another.

But I was speaking of the Christian Endeavor Societies of North America,—what they did this year for Church Extension. We at Bentonville, few in numbers and with more apples than dollars, gave $10. The Forest Avenue Church, Kansas City, gave $2 more than we did. Columbia gave $4 less. The two churches in Buffalo seem to have clubbed together to scrape up $5.20. Lincoln (where Bryan lives when he's at home) gave just what Bentonville gave. So did Seattle. So did Omaha, Portland and Topeka. So did Independence, Mo., and that brings out a curious point.

You know, people who favor saloons in a town argue that the revenue helps the sidewalks, macadamizes streets and makes the town in all ways more prosperous. Yet here is Independence which has just voted for saloons giving $10, though far richer and stronger than we; and here we are giving $10, though this town is so dry that you can't buy a drop of liquor in any drugstore. I mean actually; not that it's supposed you can't do it, or that people pretend to believe you can't do it, but you can't. Poor old Independence! I used to live there once. Anyway, Liberty, Mo., has gone against whisky. And for Church Extension, the Sheffield Avenue Church of Chicago, Ill., gave 50 cents. Pretty good for Chicago, eh! Old Cook County isn't going to be left behind in the procession!

Mrs. F. N. Potts sends her 27th Av. S. quarterly report from Chattanooga. During the quarter she read from Luke to Romans. For history, 122 pp. "Glimpses of Fifty Years," and 17 pp. "World's Great Events." Poetry, 1503 lines from Whittier and 72 from Luella Clark.

George W. Dawson, Kansas City, Mo.: "It's about time for me to contribute my mite to the good work of the Av. S. I forward a dollar for orphan Charlie, and a dollar for Missionary Drusie. I am glad you like it so well down at Bentonville; I have no doubt it is a healthy climate. We, too, had pleasant weather last fall and so far this winter."

The following letters will explain a little of the practical good accomplished by our Advance Society. This is from Orphan Charlie, date, December 6: "I have not started to school yet, as my eyes have given me considerable trouble. The doctor says I can't go until after Christmas. I have a place to stay in the office next door, and I will attend to the furnace of one of the board ladies for my meals. This work will not interfere with school. The bill is as follows: Shoes, $3; crutches, $1.55; suit, $8.78. I will let you know as soon as I hear from Bessie" [his sister] "whether her guardian's dying will affect her staying on the farm. I hope not."

The next letter is from Mrs. B. R. Brown, matron of the Orphan's Home: "Sometimes a little fellow wanders into the office, the tears welled up in his eyes, —then one losing its balance and trickling down his cheek,—saying: "They blame everything onto me, and I didn't do it, neither!' I promised Charlie to write you, sending bills when he purchased his suit, but this slipped my memory, and won't you blame it 'all onto me,' and excuse Charlie? Charlie's eyes have been giving him much trouble, and at the time you wrote concerning his suit, he could not bear the light without much suffering. He is anxious to be in school, and arrangements are made for his doing so, as soon as the doctor permits. The bill is $13.33. I will suggest to Mrs. Harrison that she send you these bills receipted." (No, she needn't. Since Charlie has the clothes on his back, that's all the receipt I need. I wondered [and expressed my wonder] if Charlie would wear out those clothes before writing to the Av. S.—not knowing, of course, that his eyes were out of repairs. No little child ever came to me in the afflicted condition portrayed by the experienced pen of Mrs. Brown, without at once getting all the candy on my person; and I am this day sending Mrs. Brown a little box of candy, hoping it will dry those repentant tears, and that she will be good next time. I sent $13.35, giving Charlie carte blanc as to the investment of the extra five cents. My next letter from him is dated December 11:

"I am glad to say that my eyes are getting much better; but the doctor says it will be some time after Christmas before I can go to school. It was on account of my eyes that I did not write sooner. Mrs. Brown said she would write a letter to you, but she has been so busy that I suppose it left her mind." (No, she explains that she was simply naughty; but she is sorry, and I hope the candy that goes out in to-day's mail will comfort her conscience). "The two cents surplus which you sent is now sticking up in the right hand corner of the envelope which incloses the letter. I thought that a safe investment. The orphans at the Home are learning their Christmas songs, and all are eager for the 25th to roll around. They enjoyed an evening down town this week, looking at the excellent displays that the large stores are producing." [Pity that some of those large St. Louis churches couldn't show a donation to Church Extension from their Endeavor Societies! However, I'm glad the store windows are pretty.] I have not heard from Bessie yet. I hope you have a very pleasant Christmas."

This holiday greeting from the Av. S. orphan is not meant exclusively for me, of course, but to every member of the Av. S., and to those friends of the society who have helped a little to make his life brighter. I, too, wish to extend greetings from my own heart, and to assure all those who ever contributed to Charlie or Drusie, that it pleased me more than if you had sent me a personal gift; and to urge those keeping the 5 rules to persevere, and make 1908 the best year the society has ever known.

—It is gratifying to know that our readers are so pleased with THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for themselves that many are sending it as a Christmas gift to their friends. We profoundly appreciate the privilege of ministering to multitudes of new homes.

—We believe that the most popular book we have to offer this winter will be "Where The Book Speaks." Its author is one of the most justly renowned and popular of our living Disciples—Archibald McLean, president of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. We have just received 500 from the bindery. They ought to be taken before Jan. 1. Postpaid for $1.00.

—The typographical appearance of our Bible school literature for the first quarter of 1908 is not all that could be desired. Cruel strikes in our composing and press rooms prevented the artistic work we desired to present to our patrons, but the wealth of solid learning our editors have dedicated to this ministry is all there. Great mechanical improvements will be made in our Helps for the quarter beginning April 1.

—Our book store affords our brethren unsurpassed facilities for procuring all publications promptly and at the lowest rates. There is no longer any justification on the grounds of price or service for patronizing the denominational publishing houses. Brethren, let us be mutually helpful. Will you not favor us with your book account as far, at least, as we meet all competitors' prices?

—We receive a great many letters congratulating the management over the facility with which changes may be made in orders for books, papers, Bible school supplies and other merchandise, and the ease with which little business misunderstandings are adjusted. Besides the personal satisfaction of it, we have learned it pays in many ways to accord our brethren every courtesy and privilege at all in harmony with the rules of business success.

—One result of the wider use of our Bible school literature hereafter will be a great constituency more deeply learned in the Word and consequently more zealous for its exemplification in daily life and its extension throughout the whole world. Bible school helps contain a most vital relationship to the future of this Reformation and to all Christianity. Would you not better examine our peerless line of publications with a view of introducing the best into your school?

WHAT FRIENDS ARE SAYING.

—THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST improves all the time.—Jas. Butchart (medical missionary), Lu Chow Fu.

—I enclose $1.50 for THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I am past eighty years of age but must read this paper while time lasts on earth for me.—Thomas J. Oyler, Denver, Colo.

THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is the best paper in the world. A little more prohibition would not hurt. May you all have health and strength and wisdom to fight the battle for the Lord, is the prayer of your brother.—I. M. Irwine, Cedar City, Mo.

—I have taken THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST since I entered the church as a boy in 1881 and have for many years seen and appreciated the fact that it is my most efficient help in coming to an understanding of the truth and in mustering courage to do it.—J. L. Ellis, Boggs, Wyoming.

—I have received the beautiful fountain pen you offer as a premium for a new subscription to THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. It is tip top, I am writing with it now. Have used a great many others that are widely advertised and have found none better than the one you sent me. Accept my thanks for promptness in sending it.—J. Crockett Mullins, Calumet, Okla.

I am home again trying to work out some of your good suggestions. We have been "going some" in stirring up the men of the church and as soon as we get our breath will be "goin' some more." I want to thank you for the great help you were to me. I only wish I could have had you at the parsonage and used you some more. I would like to have gone to school to you the whole time. But then I hope we can have you with us again and that by that time you can see the good you have done us this time.

In my rush of work since returning from Norfolk I have neglected to speak of Brother Stevenson's lectures here. I want to thank you for making it possible to have this man of God with us and for calling attention to the matter when you did. Every lecture was a masterpiece. The course was thoroughly enjoyed by our home members, and many others expressed their gratitude for the privilege of hearing the expositions of the Word. We hope to have Brother Stevenson with us again.—W. E. Pierce (Minister), Cameron, W. Va.
